ADDRESS OF THE VICE PRESIDENT.

The VICE PRESIDENT exhibited a certificate of his having taken the oath of office prescribed by law; which was read; and he addressed the Senate as follows:

Gentlemen of the Senate:

Our fellow-citizens, in the free exercise of their Constitutional authority, having been pleased to honor the person addressing you, with this distinguished station, have inferred from him an indispensable obligation to meet their just expectations. To attain this desirable object, and to preside over this honorable body in conformity to their magnanimity and dignity, which at all times have been conspicuous, will be his primary pursuit. Whilst the Constitution has invested him with Legislative and Executive powers, in cases only that are casual, to the decisions of these, it has attached a great responsibility; in anticipating which, and his other duties, he has the pleasing prospect of reposing on your liberality and candor. But if, in this high and influential branch of the Government, such unanimity should prevail, as to decide for themselves every question of policy, the example will still increase their lustre, and add to his happiness.

It is a subject of cordial congratulation, that the liberties of the people, in so great a degree, rest on that wisdom and fortitude which mark the characters of the exalted personage who fills the Supreme Executive, of the dignified members who constitute the National Legislature, and of the eminent officers who direct the Ministerial departments—public virtues, emulated by few Governments, need no encomiums. Fidelity and integrity, unsubdued by the severest ordeals, and pre-saging to public calamities a favorable issue, will be ever held in high estimation; whilst a Government, scrupulously faithful to its trust, and measures which merit the highest applause, have a just claim to the public support.

The present epoch is momentous, and leads to observations which would not occur on ordinary occasions,

Our country is again involved in a sanguinary conflict, the issue of which, in the estimation of the enemy, is to determine whether the republican system, adopted by the people, is imbecile and transient, or whether it has force and duration worthy of the enterprise. That it can never fail whilst they are true to their interest, is beyond doubt. And is it not equally so, that they will never desert the Government of their choice, or attach themselves to a foreign domination, from which, under the benign smiles of Divine Providence, they have lately, by their own valor, emancipated themselves? Can they need arguments to convince them, that, in proportion to the purity of Republican Governments, have ever been the reproaches and efforts for overthrowing them, by imperious Sovereigns who once ruled them?

"To divide and to conquer" have long been the objects of the enemy. He has presumed on his own arts, and on impotency in our system of Government; but, in both instances, he will be convinced of his error. The people and constituted authorities of the several States, those great pillars of our confederate system, numerous as they are, and inevitably discordant in some of their interests, have evinced, in various ways, a firm determination to support it. The interior frontier States, where the territorial war commenced and continues, assailed by innumerable difficulties, have surmounted them; and, by their unanimity and Spartan valor, are establishing for themselves immortal honor. Through the extensive wilds of our military operations, some of these, as in all wars, have been successful, and others unfortunate. But, to whatever causes the latter may be traced, they never can be imputed to those heroic officers or privates of the army or of the militia, who have bravely combatted the enemy; and of whom, some have been crowned with laurels, others have submitted to irresistible misfortunes, and many have nobly fallen, enshrined with glory. The Atlantic States have repelled, with magnanimity, maritime invasions; and have also given proofs of their patriotic ardor, by conquests on the ocean. Their enterprises and victories have been sources of national triumph and renown. Are not our officers and mariners, in naval combats, unrivalled by fame? Have they not presented infallible sureties for signalizing themselves on great occasions? How vain then is the hope of divisions or conquest? Does the enemy expect, by burning defenceless towns and villages, to promote his views? Such conduct may entail on the nation which sanctions it eternal infamy, but can never subdue the elevated souls of our brave fellow-citizens, or even depress the sublime minds of our innocent fair, the ornaments of our country, who, amidst the unmerited distresses inflicted on them and their tender offspring by a merciless foe, will soar above sympathy, and claim the just tribute of universal admiration and applause.

Whilst the Executive, in the full exercise of its authority, is left to test the sincerity of pacific overtures, it is a happy circumstance that the United States, at all times desirous of an honorable peace, and superintended by an officer whose capacious mind embraces, and whose patriotic fortitude will pursue, every interest of his country, thus meet with ardor an indispensable war. Is not their power a pledge that they can, and their sacred honor that they will, with intrepidity, maintain the conflict? They demand justice; and can they relinquish it without a surrender of their sovereignty?

Great Britain is in collision with her best customers, and once her commercial friends, who had viewed peace as a mutual blessing; and who, by their moderation, had preserved it, until necessity has pointed to a different line of conduct. They had annually sent to her their productions and specie to a vast amount; had thus employed her mechanics, purchased her manufactures, extended her commerce, and become a great source of her national wealth. Hence, her zealous and persevering opposition to their commercial restraints, representing, in high strains, their great injury to this country; but preserving silence on a most important point, their destructive effects on her own manufactures and commerce.

The United States are now her enemy; and is it not easy to foresee, that, if the war should continue, the Canadas will be rendered independent of her; and, as friends or allies to the United States, will no longer be instrumental in exciting an unrelenting and savage warfare against our extensive and defenceless borders? To such inhuman acts, in former times, were the Canadians urged by France in her Albion wars; and by our colonial aid Great Britain obtained jurisdiction over them. She in turn has abused this power, and has justified the United States in their efforts to divest her of it. And is not their energy adequate to the object? Will not this be evident by a view of their effective National and State Governments? of the unconquered minds and formidable numbers of their citizens? of their martial spirit? of their innate attachment to their rights and liberties? and of their inflexible determination to preserve them? But, if any one still doubts, will he not recollect, that, at the commencement of our Revolutionary war, which terminated against her, the united colonies had not a third of their present population; nor arms or military stores for a single campaign; nor an efficient arrangement for warfare; nor specie in their treasuries; nor funds for emitting a paper currency; nor a national Government; nor (excepting two instances) State Governments? nor the knowledge either of military or of naval tactics? Will he not also remember that Great Britain was then in the zenith of her power; that neighboring nations trembled at her nod; that the colonies were under her control; that her Crown officers opposed every mean for resisting her; excited amongst the colonial Governments (over which they presided) unfounded jealousies of each other, and embarrassed every measure for their union; that she was loaded with less than a fifth of her present national debt; that she was then at peace with all the world; and that she is now at war with a greater part of Europe, as well as with the United States? If Great Britain herself reflects on these things, will she not relinquish her vain attempts to awe the citizens of the United States, by exaggerated statements of her military and naval power, or by delusive views of their unprepared state for a war, of the great expense of it, and of the difficulties they are to encounter in defence of all that is valuable to man? If, in lieu of fruitless artifices, she will make rational and equitable arrangements, which the Government of the United States have been always ready to meet, can there be a doubt that the two nations will be speedily restored to their wonted friendship and commerce?

Your fellow-citizen, with sensations which can more easily be conceived than expressed, perceives that there are in the Government many of his former friends and compatriots, with whom he has often co-operated in the perilous concerns of his country; and, with unfeigned pleasure, he will meet the other public func-tionaries, whose acknowledged abilities and public services in like manner claim his high consideration and respect. With a sacred regard to the rights of every Department and officer of Government, and with a respectful deference to their political principles and opinions, he has frankly declared his own; for, to have concealed them at a crisis like this, might have savored too much of a deficiency of candor.

And may that Omnipotent Being, who, with infinite wisdom and justice, superintends the destinies of nations, confirm the heroic patriotism which has glowed in the breasts of the national rulers, and convince the enemy that, whilst a disposition to peace, on equitable and honorable terms, will ever prevail in their public councils, one spirit, animated by the love of country, will inspire every Department of the National Government.

E. GERRY.

WASHINGTON, May 24, 1813.

On motion by Mr. ANDERSON, the Secretary was directed to notify the House of Representatives that a quorum of the Senate is assembled and ready to proceed to business.

A committee was appointed on the part of the Senate, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them.

Ordered, that the Secretary notify the House of Representatives accordingly.

On motion, by Mr. LEIB, a committee was appointed agreeably to the 42d rule for conducting business in the Senate; and Messrs LEIB, GILMAN, and DANA, were appointed the committee.

On motion, by Mr. HOWELL, a committee was appointed agreeably to the 22d rule for conducting business in the Senate; and Messrs. HOWELL, ROBINSON, and MORROW, were appointed the committee.

On motion, by Mr. CAMPBELL, the usual resolution was agreed to for supplying the Senators with newspapers.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from JAMES LLOYD, notifying the resignation of his seat in the Senate.

On motion of Mr. LEIB,

Resolved, That Mountjoy Bayly, Doorkeeper and Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate, be, and he is hereby, authorized to employ one assistant and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services as are usually required by the Doorkeeper of the Senate; which expense shall be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. ANDERSON submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled, and have elected HENRY CLAY, Esquire, one of the Representatives for the State of Kentucky, their Speaker, and are ready to proceed to business. They concur in the resolution of the Senate for the appointment of a joint committee to wait on the President of the United States and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them; and have appointed a committee on their part.

TUESDAY, May 25.

Mr. ANDERSON reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that the President informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses this day at twelve o'clock.

The Senate resumed the motion made yesterday for the appointment of Chaplains, and agreed thereto.

The PRESIDENT communicated the memorial of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, praying the confirmation of titles to certain lands sold by the trustees of the University in said Territory; and the memorial was read.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

At an early day after the close of the last session of Congress, an offer was formally communicated from His Imperial Majesty the Emperor of Russia, of his mediation, as the common friend of the United States and Great Britain, for the purpose of facilitating a peace between them. The high character of the Emperor Alexander being a satisfactory pledge for the sincerity and impartiality of his offer, it was immediately accepted; and, as further proof of the disposition on the part of the United States to meet their adversary in honorable experiments for terminating the war, it was determined to avoid intermediate delays, incident to the distance of the parties, by a definitive provision for the contemplated negotiation. Three of our eminent citizens were accordingly commissioned, with the requisite powers to conclude a Treaty of Peace with persons clothed with like powers on the part of Great Britain. They are authorized also to enter into such conventional regulations of the commerce between the two countries, as may be mutually advantageous. The two Envoys who were in the United States at the time of their appointment, have proceeded to join their colleague already at St. Petersburg.

The Envoys have received another commission, authorizing them to conclude with Russia a Treaty of Commerce, with a view to strengthen the amicable relations and improve the beneficial intercourse between the two countries.

The issue of this friendly interposition of the Russian Emperor, and this pacific manifestation on the part of the United States, time only can decide. That the sentiments of Great Britain towards that Sovereign will have produced an acceptance of his offered mediation must be presumed. That no adequate motives exist to prefer a continuance of war with the United States, to the terms on which they are willing to close it, is certain. The British Cabinet also must be sensible that, with respect to the important question of impressment, on which the war so essentially turns, a search for, or seizure of, British persons or property on board neutral vessels on the high seas is not a belligerent right derived from the law of nations; and it is obvious that no visit or search, or use of force for any purpose, on board the vessels of one independent Power, on the high seas, can, in war or peace, be sanctioned by the laws or authority of another Power. It is equally obvious, that, for the purpose of preserving to each State its seafaring members, by excluding them from the vessels of the other, the mode heretofore proposed by the United States, and now enacted by them as an article of municipal policy, cannot for a moment be compared with the mode practised by Great Britain with a conviction of its title to preference; inasmuch, as the latter leaves the discrimination between the mariners of the two nations to officers exposed by unavoidable bias, as well as by a defect of evidence, to a wrong decision; under circumstances precluding, for the most part, the enforcement of controlling penalties, and where a wrong decision, besides the irreparable violation of the sacred rights of persons, might frustrate the plans and profits of entire voyages: whereas, the mode assumed by the United States, guards, with studied fairness and efficacy, against errors in such cases, and avoids the effect of casual errors on the safety of navigation, and the success of mercantile expeditions.

If the reasonableness of expectations, drawn from these considerations, could guaranty their fulfilment, a just peace would not be distant. But, it becomes the wisdom of the National Legislature to keep in mind the true policy, or rather the indispensable obligation, of adapting its measures to the supposition, that the only course to that happy event, is in the vigorous employment of the resources of war. And, painful as the reflection is, this duty is particularly enforced by the spirit and manner in which the war continues to be waged by the enemy, who, uninfluenced by the unvaried examples of humanity set them, are adding to the savage fury of it, on one frontier, a system of plunder, and conflagration on the other, equally forbidden by respect for national character, and by the established rules of civilized warfare.

As an encouragement to persevering and invigorated exertions to bring the contest to a happy result, I have the satisfaction of being able to appeal to the auspicious progress of our arms, both by land and on the water.

In continuation of the brilliant achievements of our infant Navy, a signal triumph has been gained by Captain Lawrence and his companions in the Hornet sloop of war, which destroyed a British sloop of war, with a celerity so unexampled, and with a slaughter of the enemy so disproportionate to the loss in the Hornet, as to claim for the conquerors the highest praise, and the full recompense provided by Congress in preceding cases. Our public ships of war in general, as well as the private armed vessels, have continued also their activity and success against the commerce of the enemy, and, by their vigilance and address, have greatly frustrated the efforts of the hostile squadrons distributed along our coasts, to intercept them in returning into port, and resuming their cruises.

The augmentation of our Naval force, as authorized at the last session of Congress, is in progress. On the Lakes our superiority is near at hand, where it is not already established.

The events of the campaign, so far as they are known to us, furnish matter of congratulation, and show that, under a wise organization and efficient direction, the Army is destined to a glory not less brilliant than that which already encircles the Navy. The attack and capture of York is, in that quarter, a presage of future and greater victories; while, on the western frontier, the issue of the late siege of Fort Meigs leaves us nothing to regret but a single act of inconsiderate valor.

The provisions last made for filling the ranks, and enlarging the staff of the Army, have had the best effects. It will be for the consideration of Congress, whether other provisions, depending on their authority, may not still further improve the Military Establishment and the means of defence.

The sudden death of the distinguished citizen who represented the United States in France, without any special arrangements by him for such a contingency, has left us without the expected sequel to his last communications: nor has the French Government taken any measures for bringing the depending negotiations to a conclusion, through its representative in the United States. This failure adds to delays before so unreasonably spun out. A successor to our deceased Minister has been appointed, and is ready to proceed on his mission: the course which he will pursue in fulfilling it, is that prescribed by a steady regard to the true interests of the United States, which equally avoids an abandonment of their just demands, and a connexion of their fortunes with the systems of other Powers.

The receipts in the Treasury, from the 1st of October to the 31st day of March last, including the sums received on account of Treasury notes, and of the loans authorized by the acts of the last and preceding sessions of Congress, have amounted to fifteen millions four hundred and twelve thousand dollars. The expenditures during the same period amounted to fifteen millions nine hundred and twenty thousand dollars, and left in the Treasury, on the 1st of April, the sum of one million eight hundred and fifty-seven thousand dollars. The loan of sixteen millions of dollars, authorized by the act of the 8th of February last, has been contracted for. Of that sum more than a million of dollars had been paid into the Treasury, prior to the 1st of April, and formed a part of the receipts as above stated. The remainder of that loan, amounting to near fifteen millions of dollars, with the sum of five millions of dollars authorized to be issued in Treasury notes, and the estimated receipts from the customs and the sales of public lands, amounting to nine millions three hundred thousand dollars, and making in the whole twenty-nine millions three hundred thousand dollars to be received during the last nine months of the present year, will be necessary to meet the expenditures already authorized, and the engagements contracted in relation to the public debt. These engagements amount during that period to ten millions five hundred thousand dollars, which, with near one million for the civil, miscellaneous, and diplomatic expenses, both foreign and domestic, and seventeen millions eight hundred thousand dollars for the military and naval expenditures, including the ships of war building and to be built, will leave a sum in the Treasury at the end of the present year equal to that on the first of April last. A part of this sum may be considered as a resource for defraying any extraordinary expenses already authorized by law, beyond the sums above estimated; and a further resource for any emergency may be found in the sum of one million of dollars, the loan of which to the United States has been authorized by the State of Pennsylvania, but which has not yet been brought into effect.

This view of our finances, whilst it shows that due provision has been made for the expenses of the current year, shows, at the same time, by the limited amount of the actual revenue, and the dependence on loans, the necessity of providing more adequately for the future supplies of the Treasury. This can be best done by a well digested system of internal revenue, in aid of existing sources; which will have the effect, both of abridging the amount of necessary loans, and on that account, as well as by placing the public credit on a more satisfactory basis, of improving the terms on which loans may be obtained. The loan of sixteen millions was not contracted for at a less interest than about seven and a half per cent., and, although other causes may have had an agency, it cannot be doubted, that, with the advantage of a more extended and less precarious revenue, a lower rate of interest might have sufficed. A longer postponement of this advantage could not fail to have a still greater influence on future loans.

In recommending to the National Legislature this resort to additional taxes, I feel great satisfaction in the assurance, that our constituents, who have already displayed so much zeal and firmness in the cause of their country, will cheerfully give any other proof of their patriotism which it calls for. Happily, no people, with local and transitory exceptions, never to be wholly avoided, are more able than the people of the United States to spare for the public wants a portion of their private means, whether regard be had to the ordinary profits of industry, or the ordinary price of subsistence in our country, compared with those in any other. And in no case could stronger reasons be felt for yielding the requisite contributions. By rendering the public resources certain, and commensurate to the public exigencies, the constituted authorities will be able to prosecute the war the more rapidly to its proper issue; every hostile hope, founded on a calculated failure of our resources, will be cut off; and by adding to the evidence of bravery and skill, in combats on the ocean and the land, an alacrity in supplying the treasure necessary to give them their fullest effect, and demonstrating to the world the public energy which our political institutions combine, with the personal liberty distinguishing them, the best security will be provided against future enterprises on the rights or the peace of the nation.

The contest in which the United States are engaged, appeals for its support to every motive that can animate an uncorrupted and enlightened people; to the love of country; to the pride of liberty; to an emulation of the glorious founders of their independence, by a successful vindication of its violated attributes; to the gratitude and sympathy which demand security from the most degrading wrongs of a class of citizens, who have proved themselves so worthy the protection of their country, by their heroic zeal in its defence; and, finally, to the sacred obligation of transmitting entire, to future generations, that precious patrimony of national rights and independence which is held in trust by the present, from the goodness of Divine Providence.

Being aware of the inconveniences to which a protracted session, at this season, would be liable, I limit the present communication to objects of primary importance. In special messages which may ensue, regard will be had to the same consideration.

JAMES MADISON.

MEMORIAL OF ARMY OFFICERS.

The PRESIDENT communicated the memorial of sundry officers attached to the Army under the command of Major General William H. Harrison, representing that, in appointments and promotions recently made in the Army, injustice has been done to officers now in service, and praying the attention of the Senate to certain cases in which they feel the usages of armies, and their individual rights, have been violated; and the memorial was read. It is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate of the United States:

The officers undersigned (now in the service of the United States, and attached to the Army under the command of Major General William H. Harrison) respectfully represent:

Having observed several appointments and promotions recently made in the Army, and particularly in the corps to which we severally belong, and feeling that in some of them injustice has been done officers now in service, we owe it to ourselves, as well as the service in which we are engaged, to make known to your honorable body the wrongs complained of; you alone possessing the corrective power.

Our distance from the seat of Government prevents an immediate knowledge of new arrangements, made in the War Department, but we have seen no public document authorizing (as we conceive) some of the recent appointments and promotions from that Department. If, in the promotions and new appointments in the Army, the age of an officer's commission, and the duration of service are to be wholly disregarded, few men would enter the Army except from necessity—a crisis, we presume, wished for by none who has the good of his country at heart.

We are unwilling to believe that your honorable body would sanction a course so destructive to the necessary excitements of a soldier, and so chilling to his laudable ambition; nor would we have troubled you with this address, had we not feared that, in the crowd of momentous matter which might occupy your attention at the present session of Congress, it might escape your consideration, that, in some of the appointments recently made, private citizens have been made captains over the heads of subaltern officers, who have been long in service; nor is it less worthy your attention, that, in many instances, subalterns have been promoted over the heads of superior officers—over officers, too, who, from experience, as well as services rendered their country in the field of battle, have at least some claim to the ordinary and just patronage of their Government.

We are well aware that, in armies, the usages of nations sanction extraordinary and honorable notice of even private soldiers, where extraordinary and honorable deeds authorize it, and we would be the last to complain at the elevation of a brother soldier, or even a private citizen, under similar circumstances.

It is unnecessary, we conceive, to call your attention to the individual promotions and appointments by which we feel the usages of armies, and our individual rights, violated; they must necessarily be laid before you for approval.

In thus obtruding ourselves before the Senate of the United States, we trust it will be seen that we are actuated by no other motive than that which should pervade the breast of every soldier, and that the matter and manner of address evince the greatest respect and deference, both to your honorable body and that of the War Department.

PETITION OF STEPHEN GIRARD.

The following report, made on the petition of Stephen Girard and others, was taken up and agreed to:

The Committee to whom was referred the memorial of Stephen Girard and others, report:

That the memorialists, respectively, were owners of the ships Good Friends, the United States, and the Amazon, with their respective cargoes.

That, in the fall of the year 1811, the memorialists, being apprehensive that a war would break out between the United States and Great Britain, sent the ships and cargoes to Amelia island, as a place of safety; with an intention, eventually, to bring them to the United States, if the non-importation law should be repealed, or the sanction of Government should be obtained, so as to render the importation lawful.

That while the ships and cargoes lay in the port of Fernandina, General Mathews, acting in the name, and on behalf of the United States, took possession of Amelia island, and established a local government there.

That the agents of the memorialists represented to General Mathews the increased danger to which the ships and cargoes were exposed in consequence of the revolution at Amelia island; and General Mathews, impressed with the justice of the representation, as well as with an apprehension that the continuance of so much valuable property there would invite hostilities, granted a license to proceed with the ships and cargoes to the port of Philadelphia, under bonds to place them in the custody of the collector of the port, subject to the orders of the Government.

That the ships and cargoes on their way to Philadelphia, under the authority of the license, were intercepted and seized in the district of Delaware, in April, 1812, and libelled on the ground of a violation of the non-importation law.

That, soon after the seizure, the ships and cargoes were restored to their respective owners, upon bonds for the appraised value, to abide the final adjudication of the prosecution which had been instituted. And the cargoes were sold in the months of April and May, 1812.

That the memorialists, upon receiving the cargoes, made the regular entries at the custom-house, and secured, by bonds, the payment of the duties which were payable according to law, at the time of entry.

That, upon examination, it appears that, in some cases, the Secretary of the Treasury, under the act of March, 1797, and Congress, by special acts, have remitted forfeitures, upon condition that the respective owners should pay the rate of duties imposed by the act of the 1st of July, 1812, although the importations were made prior to that day. But it is understood that, in all such cases, the cargoes remained unsold until the act of the 1st of July commenced its operation; and, of course, the double duties were charged in the price to the purchasers.

Upon this view of the circumstances of the case, the committee submit the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to bring in a bill for the relief of Stephen Girard, and others, the owners, respectively, of the ships called the Good Friends, the United States, and the Amazon, and their cargoes, upon condition that they respectively pay to the collector of the port of Philadelphia, for the use of the United States, in addition to the duties by them heretofore respectively secured and paid upon the said cargoes, a sum which shall be sufficient to make the whole amount paid equal to the amount of duties that would have been chargeable if the cargoes had been imported and entered subsequent to the 1st of July, 1812.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the select committee on the petition of Joshua Barney, and others, which is as follows:

"That the object of the petition is to obtain, in favor of himself and others, the relinquishment of the claims of the United States to certain descriptions of enemy's property, captured and brought into the ports of the United States by certain private armed vessels. That the claims of the United States and the petitioner depend upon the provisions of existing laws, and present fair questions for judicial cognizance; these questions are in fact now depending before the proper judicial tribunals, with whose proceedings and decisions the committee deems it inexpedient at this time to interfere, and therefore recommends that the further consideration of the petition be postponed till the first Monday in December next."

And, on the question to agree thereto? it was determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 17, as follows:

CHESAPEAKE AND DELAWARE CANAL.

Mr. HORSEY, from the committee to whom were referred the Message of the President of the United States, of the 5th ultimo, together with the act therein communicated, made the following report:

That, on the 5th of March last, the General Assembly of the State of Pennsylvania passed an act authorizing the Governor of that Commonwealth to subscribe, Chesapeake and Delaware Canal.

in behalf of the same, three hundred and seventy-five shares in the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, if the United States shall subscribe seven hundred and fifty shares, the State of Maryland two hundred and fifty shares, and the State of Delaware one hundred shares, in the same company. That the utility and importance of a navigable canal over the isthmus which separates the bays of Chesapeake and Delaware, is so well understood, and so universally admitted, your committee have deemed it unnecessary to say anything in addition to what already appears in the various reports and communications hitherto made to Congress on this subject. The cause which suspended the operations of the company, the extent and nature of the canal, the progress and state of the work, the annual saving to the community, the probable revenue of the canal, and the expenses of the whole work, are so ably stated and estimated in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the subject of public roads and canals, of the 2d of March, A. D. 1807, that your committee have taken the liberty to introduce here that part of the said report which relates to this particular subject.

“III. Delaware and Chesapeake Canal.

“A company incorporated by the States of Delaware and Maryland for opening this canal has commenced its operations, now suspended for want of funds.

“The canal will commence at Welsh point, on Elk river—an arm of the Chesapeake—and terminate at a distance of twenty-two miles on Christiana creek, a branch of the Delaware. At low water, the depth of water in Christiana is nine feet, and in Elk twelve feet, within one hundred feet from the shore. The tide rises four feet in both rivers. The canal might, without increasing the distance, be conducted to Newcastle, on the Delaware itself, instead of ending at Christiana creek.

“The highest intermediate ground over which the canal will be carried, on a level of thirteen miles in length, is seventy-four feet above tide-water, the descent being effected by nine locks on each side. The digging is generally easy; no expensive aqueducts or bridges, nor any other obstacle, but those which have already been overcome in digging the feeder through a very rocky soil.

“The supply of water drawn from Elk river, by a feeder six miles in length, (already completed, which is itself a boat canal three and a half feet deep, united by a lock of ten feet lift with the main canal,) is calculated to fill daily one hundred and forty-four locks—a quantity sufficient, on an average, for the daily passage of twenty-four vessels. A reservoir covering thirty, and which may be increased to one hundred and fifty acres, will supply occasional deficiencies. Other reservoirs may be added; and Christiana and White Clay creeks may hereafter be brought in aid of Elk river, if the supply should prove too scanty for an increased navigation.

or nine feet deep over the gate-sills, containing each eleven thousand five hundred to thirteen thousand cubic feet of water, and with a lift of eight to nine feet each) will be constructed of hewn stone, laid in tarras. Those dimensions, both of the canal and locks, recommended by Mr. Latrobe, the engineer of the canal, may be adopted in all the other canals for sea-vessels on this line of communication.

“The present annual carriage across the peninsula, which would be drawn through the canal, is estimated at forty-two thousand tons, exclusive of passengers. This will be greatly increased by the facility which the canal itself will afford to the commercial intercourse between the two bays, and to the conveyance of articles now carried through other channels, or too heavy for transportation at the present expense of carriage. The coals wanted for Philadelphia, and which, brought down from the sources of the Susquehannah and Potomac, but principally from the vicinity of Richmond, would naturally pass through the canal, have been alone estimated at more than one hundred thousand tons a year. The annual carriage of all articles may, in the present state of the population, be fairly estimated at one hundred and fifty thousand tons, and the direct annual saving to the community at three hundred thousand dollars—being at the rate of two dollars a ton for the difference between land and water carriage across the peninsula, after paying the tolls. These, at the rate of fifty cents a ton, will give to the undertakers a revenue of seventy-five thousand dollars, leaving, after a deduction of ten thousand dollars for annual repairs, and of ten thousand dollars more for attendance and contingencies, a net income of fifty-five thousand dollars.

“The expenses of the whole work are estimated as follows:

|----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|---|---|---|---|-----------|
| “Digging twenty-two miles, at twenty thousand dollars a mile | - | - | - | - | $440,000 |
| “Eighteen locks, at ten thousand dollars each | - | - | - | - | 180,000 |
| (The whole lockage being one hundred and forty-eight feet, would, at one thousand two hundred and fifty dollars a foot, amount to one hundred and eighty-five thousand dollars.) | | | | | |
| “Feeder, (nearly completed,) reservoirs, lock at the feeder, purchase of water-rights and land, including a debt of ——— dollars due by the company | - | - | - | - | 230,000 |
| Total | - | - | - | - | $850,000 |

“The interest on which sum, at six per cent., is fifty-one thousand dollars.

“The capital originally subscribed amounted to four hundred thousand dollars, divided into two thousand shares of two hundred dollars each. One-half of these has been forfeited, after a small payment of five dollars on each share. One hundred thousand dollars, paid by the other stockholders, have been expended in preparatory measures, in the purchase of water-rights, and in digging the feeder, which was considered as the most difficult part of the work. Seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars are still wanted to complete the work; of which sum, one hundred thousand dollars is payable by the stockholders, and the deficiency of six hundred and fifty thousand dollars must be drawn from other sources.”

From this report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it would appear that the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars is now wanted to enable the company to complete the work.

|------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|------------------|
| Of this sum, there is already subscribed, and payable by the stockholders - - - | $100,000 |
| If the State of Pennsylvania subscribe three hundred and seventy-five shares - - - | 75,000 |
| If the State of Maryland subscribe two hundred and fifty shares - - - | 50,000 |
| If the State of Delaware subscribe one hundred shares - - - | 20,000 |
| If the United States subscribe seven hundred and fifty shares - - - | 150,000 |
| The company will have - - - | $395,000 |

A sum which will enable them to recommence their operations, and, according to the estimate of the Secretary of the Treasury, nearly sufficient to complete the digging of the main canal.

Should this public aid be afforded, your committee feel a persuasion it would give a new impulse to the work, reanimate the company, inspire the community with confidence, induce the aid of individual capitalists, and insure, at no very distant period, the completion of an undertaking of great national as well as local advantage and importance.

The lateness of the session, however, and the nature of the business which at present engages the attention of the Senate, renders it inexpedient to bring this subject forward during this session of Congress. But, your committee, while they advise a postponement of the subject, earnestly recommend it to the early and attentive consideration of the Senate, at the next meeting of Congress.

They therefore submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the further consideration of the President's Message of the 5th ultimo, with the communication accompanying the same, be postponed to the next session of Congress.

GOVERNMENT LOAN.

Mr. BIBB communicated the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury :

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
July 19, 1813.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 17th instant, inquiring what further provision is deemed necessary to be made, during the present session of Congress, for meeting the public engagements, and defraying the public expenditures.

In the report made from this Department to Congress, on the 2d of June last, the means already provided for the service of this year was stated to be sufficient, exclusive of any additional expenditures which might be found necessary on account of the War and Navy Departments. New and additional expenditures are contemplated in those Departments, amounting to nearly a million of dollars, and calls of militia in various parts of the United States, which have already taken place, and which will probably be repeated before the close of the present year, may require a million of dollars more. An additional sum of about two millions may therefore be considered as necessary to secure the public service, during the remainder of the year, from delay and embarrassment.

As the loan for the service of the year 1814 cannot with convenience, be made sufficiently early in that year to meet the demands which must be sustained by the Treasury at its commencement, it is proposed that in addition to the sum of two millions abovementioned, for the present year, a loan should now be authorized, sufficient, with the sums receivable from the revenue, to defray the expenditures of the three first months of the year 1814.

The demands upon the Treasury for those three months are estimated as follows, to wit:

| For civil, diplomatic, and miscellaneous expenses - - - - - | $400,000 |
| For public debt, exclusive of Treasury notes and interest thereon, falling due in the months of January and February, 1814, which will be provided for out of the surplus of the Sinking Fund for the year 1813 - - - - - | 1,100,000 |
| For the War and Navy Departments - - - - - | 6,000,000 |
| | $7,500,000 |

|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-------------|
| The amount receivable from the custom-house duties, during that period, may be estimated at - - - - - | $1,500,000 |
| From sales of public lands, and from the internal duties which will go into operation on the 1st of January, 1814 - - - - - | 250,000 |

The balance which will remain in the Treasury on 31st of December next, is estimated to amount to about 2,000,000 of dollars. As this amount is somewhat larger than may be necessary to be permanently retained in the Treasury, there may be applied from it towards the demands during the first quarter of the year 1814, the sum of - - - 250,000

| Making, together - - - - - | $2,000,000 |
| And will leave to be furnished by the loan - - - - - | 5,500,000 |
| | <hr/> |

The whole sum, therefore, for which it is conceived eligible that an authority should now be given to the President to obtain, on loan, before the close of the present year, is seven millions five hundred thousand dollars; of which it is estimated that two millions may be wanted for the service of the present year, and the residue towards the supply for the service of the year 1814.

If this loan shall be authorized, a sufficient sum from its proceeds may probably be brought into the Treasury, in the course of the present year, to take the place of two millions of dollars of the Treasury notes authorized to be issued, and taken into the former estimates as a part of the resources of the present year. A special authority to make a loan for this purpose was suggested as proper to be granted by Congress, in the report to that body of the second of June last; and the necessity for it arose from the consideration, that, if five millions of dollars, being the whole amount of those notes authorized to be issued for the service of this year, should be actually issued before its close, there would be, at that time, in circulation, the sum of seven millions of dollars—a sum greater, considering the limited state of our commerce, and the small amount of custom-house bonds which will then remain outstanding, and to the payment of which they are applicable, than might perhaps be maintained in circulation, without some difficulty or depreciation. In the months of January and February, 1814, near two millions of dollars of Treasury notes, issued under the act of June 30, 1812, will be paid off; and if the issuing of that amount of those notes, authorized by the act of February, 25, 1813, for the service of the year 1813, can be postponed till that time, as it may be, if the loan now proposed should be authorized, they will merely take the place of the others, and the amount in circulation not exceed what a steady and effective demand requires.

It is not perceived that any provisions are necessary in the law for authorizing the loan, at the present time, different from those contained in the act of February 8th, 1813, authorizing a loan for a sum not exceeding sixteen millions of dollars.

I have the honor to be, &c.,
W. JONES,

Acting Secretary of the Treasury.
HON. WILLIAM W. BIBB,
Acting Chairman Com. of Ways & Means.

Government Loan.

JULY, 1813.

GOVERNMENT LOAN.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I transmit to the Senate a report of the Acting Secretary of the Treasury, containing the information requested by their resolution of the 27th instant.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, July 28, 1813.

The report is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 28, 1813.

In compliance with the resolution of the Senate, of the 27th instant, the Acting Secretary of the Treasury has the honor to report to the President of the United States—

That, by virtue of the act of February 8th, 1813, entitled "An act authorizing a loan for a sum not exceeding sixteen millions of dollars," and the authority of the President of the United States to the Secretary of the Treasury, of the 17th of the same month, a public subscription to a loan of sixteen millions of dollars was invited, by a notification issued on the 20th of February, 1813, in which the terms of the loan were specified; the most material of which terms were, that the subscribers should receive for each hundred dollars loaned to the United States, a certificate of six per cent. stock for one hundred dollars, and an annuity of one dollar, for thirteen years, from the 1st day of January, 1813. Of this notification, a copy is hereunto annexed, marked A.

The amount subscribed under this notification was $3,956,400. A second notification was issued on the 18th of March, by which the books of subscription were notified to be re-opened on the 25th of March, and kept open until the 31st day of that month, on the same terms as the former subscription. Proposals were, at the same time, invited, for loaning to the United States the whole, or any part, of the sum of sixteen millions of dollars, which might remain unsubscribed on the 1st day of April, leaving the persons thus making their proposals, to state, themselves, the terms upon which they were willing to make the loan to the United States. And it was engaged, that, if any proposals, thus made, should be accepted, with terms differing from those of any other proposals that might also be accepted, or differing from the terms on which subscriptions had already been, or might be made prior to the 1st day of April, all the persons whose proposals might be accepted, and also all those who had subscribed, or might subscribe, prior to the first day of April, should have the option of accepting the terms allowed to any other persons whose proposals might be accepted. A copy of this notification is annexed, marked B.

The amount subscribed under this notification, from the 25th to the 31st of March, inclusive, was $1,881,800. Proposals were sent in between the 1st and the 5th of April for loaning to the Government $11,106,000, being $944,200 more than could be received; and the further sum of $1,000,000 was intended to be loaned by the State of Pennsylvania, but the offer was not made in time to be accepted. The sums offered were subsequently reduced to $10,161,800, being the sum which, with the amount of the first and second subscriptions, made up the sixteen millions of dollars authorized to be borrowed.

The terms proposed by the persons who offered to loan the above sum, were of two descriptions:

1st. That the lenders were to receive a six per cent. stock, the interest payable quarter yearly, redeemable at the pleasure of the United States, at any time after the end of the year 1825, at the rate of eighty-eight per cent. or 100 dollars in stock for eighty-eight in money.

2d. That the lenders, for every hundred dollars in money, were to receive one hundred dollars in the same species of six per cent. stock, and an annuity for thirteen years, from the first of January, 1813, of one dollar and fifty cents, payable quarter yearly.

Two of the proposals also contained a condition, that if any other loan for the service of the year 1813, should be made under any law passed for that purpose, before the end of the year 1813, upon terms different from those allowed to the persons then making proposals, the option of taking those new terms should be extended to them. Copies of the letters containing these proposals are hereto annexed, marked C and D; and also a copy of the answer of the Secretary of the Treasury, by which those proposals were accepted, marked E. The other proposals contained no condition of this nature. They were accepted by letters of the Secretary of the Treasury of the same purport as that above referred to, marked E.

As the notification of the 18th of March contained an engagement that every contributor to the loan, whether under the first or second subscription, or under the proposals, should have the option of any of the terms allowed to any other contributor, a public notification was issued on the 15th of April, in which the terms allowed to the persons who had made proposals were stated, and the option as to the two kinds of stock was offered to all. A copy of this notification is subjoined, marked F.

No other contract in relation to any part of the loan of sixteen millions was entered into, than what resulted from the engagements contained in the public notifications above referred to, and the acceptance by the Secretary of the Treasury of the proposals made under those notifications.

All which is respectfully submitted.

WILLIAM JONES,

Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

PHILADELPHIA, April 5, 1813.

I am, very respectfully, &c.,

JOHN JACOB ASTOR.

Each will be entitled to receive in payment, at his option, either six per cent. stock, at the rate of eighty-eight per cent., or six per cent. stock at par, and a thirteen years' annuity of one and a half per cent. of the money loaned; which option must be made at the time of paying the first instalment. The payments shall be made in eight equal instalments, on the fifteenth day of April, May, June, July, August, September, October, and November. But every person, at the time of paying any of the instalments, may pay all, or any number of the subsequent instalments. Certificates of funded stock will, on the application of any subscriber for more than one hundred thousand dollars, be issued, on payment of any one instalment, for the amount of the next preceding instalment. In every other respect, the terms of the public notice of the 20th of February last will be considered as part of this agreement. I am, &c.,

CAPITOL HILL, June 11, 1813.

SIR: I take leave to enclose you a copy of a resolution of the Senate. The committee appointed by that resolution, have directed me to inform you that they will wait on you at such time as you may please to appoint, in order to commune with you upon the matter referred to them.

Accept assurances of my high respect.

JOSEPH ANDERSON.

Mr. ANDERSON then made this further report to wit:

"The committee to whom was referred the nomination of Albert Gallatin, to be one of the Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary to negotiate and sign a treaty of peace with Great Britain, under the mediation of the Emperor of Russia; to negotiate and sign a treaty of commerce with Great Britain; and to negotiate and sign a treaty of commerce with Russia, together with the Message of the President of the United States of the 7th June report:

"That, according to the instructions of the Senate of the 16th June, the committee, through its chairman, addressed a note to the President of the United States, on the 12th instant, a copy of which accompanies this report; and, in reply thereto, the President addressed a note to the chairman on the 14th instant, which note also accompanies this report, appointing Friday the 16th instant, to receive the committee, to communicate the aforesaid resolution of the Senate, and apprizing the committee of his late Message to the Senate, containing the grounds on which he would be obliged to decline the proposed conference with the committee. Upon due consideration of this reply, the committee deemed it an incumbent duty to wait on the President according to his appointment, and to present to him both the resolutions of the Senate, in relation to the nomination referred to the committee, and did accordingly wait on him and present them. When the President was pleased to observe to the committee in substance, that he was sorry the Senate had not taken the same view of the subject which he had done, and that he regretted that the measure had been taken under circumstances which deprived him of the aid or advice of the Senate. After the committee had remained a reasonable time for the President to make any other observations if he thought proper to do so, and observing no disposition manifested by him to enter into further remarks, the committee retired without making any observations on the matter of the resolutions, or in reply to those made by the President.

Copy of a letter from the Chairman of the Committee, on the nomination of Albert Gallatin, to the President of the United States.

JULY 12, 1813.

The committee sincerely lament, that your indisposition for some time past has been such as would have rendered it improper to have addressed you upon this subject at an earlier period; and are now much gratified to learn that you are so far restored to your health as to be enabled to attend to your official duties.

Executive Proceedings.

Accept my best wishes for a perfect restoration of your health, and assurance of my high respect.

On the question, Will the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of John Q. Adams? it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 30, nays 4, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bledsoe, Brent, Brown, Bullock, Chace, Condict, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, Mason, Morrow, Robinson, Smith, Stone, Tait, Taylor, Turner, and Worthington.

NAYS—Messrs. Dana, German, Lacock, and Varnum.

On the question, Will the Senate advise and consent to the appointment of James A. Bayard? it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 27, nays 6, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Bibb, Bledsoe, Brent, Brown, Bullock, Chace, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Giles, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, Mason, Smith, Stone, Tait, Taylor, Turner, and Worthington.

Ordered, That the Secretary lay the foregoing resolution before the President of the United States.

Mr. GORE, submitted the following motions for consideration; which were read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The President of the United States having, by the Constitution, "power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session :

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, no such vacancy can happen in any office not before full.

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Senate, the office of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to negotiate and sign a treaty of peace with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, had not been filled at any time after the declaration of war upon the 18th day of June, A. D. 1812, and before the recess of the Senate, upon the third day of March last, when the same was not full.

Resolved, That the granting of commissions to Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, to be Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary, to negotiate and sign a treaty of peace with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, during the late recess of the Senate, as, in the President's message to the Senate, of the 29th day of May last, is stated to have been done, was not, in the opinion of the Senate, authorized by the Constitution, inasmuch as a vacancy in that office did not happen during such recess of the Senate, and as the Senate had not advised and consented to their appointment. Whereupon,

Resolved, That while the Senate venerate the authority and dignity of the office of the President of the United States, and will, at all times, as a high and essential power in the Constitution, exert themselves to maintain and preserve undiminished the whole Executive authority thereby established, they owe it to the trust confided to themselves, as well as to the States, their constituents, to protect the power over appointments to office, which the Constitution has placed in that body.

From these considerations, joined to the conviction that the rights of the Senate have been infringed, by an important act, to the validity of which the advice and consent of the Senate were essential, the Senate find themselves called upon, by their duty to the States, and in support of the Constitution, reluctantly to protest, and they do hereby solemnly protest, against the commissioning, as aforesaid, of Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, as an act not authorized by the Constitution, and in the performance of which the power of the Senate has been disregarded.

Resolved, That an authenticated copy of the foregoing resolution be delivered to the President, by a committee of — members of the Senate.

To the Senate of the United States:

JAMES MADISON.

JUNE 7, 1813.

The report and documents are as follow:

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 7, 1813.

The Secretary of State, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the third instant, requesting the President to cause to be laid before the Senate the correspondence which may have passed between the United States and the King of Sweden, respecting the interchange of public Ministers, has the honor to report to the President that no direct correspondence has taken place on the subject.

In reference to the object of the resolution, the Secretary of State submits several extracts of letters from Mr. Speyer, Consul of the United States at Stockholm, and a letter from Mr. Beasley, Commissary of Prisoners at London, by which the wishes and intentions of the Swedish Government in relation to the interchange of Ministers have been made known to this Department. Respectfully submitted,

JAMES MONROE.

Executive Proceedings.Mr. Beasley to the Secretary of State.

LONDON, December 12, 1813.

SIR: Referring to my letter of the 10th instant, I have now the honor to transmit a copy of the letter which I informed you that I had received from Mr. Speyer, and of that which I stated it was my intention to address to him, on the subject of our relations with Sweden.

Notwithstanding the present apparent irritation of the Swedish Government, I have been assured by Mr. De Kantzow, and I learn from other sources, that it has invariably manifested the most friendly disposition towards the United States. Those American vessels which have sought shelter in its ports have experienced perfect protection. British cruisers are not allowed, within its territories, to dispose of prizes they make from the United States; and, in some instances, the protection of Swedish convoy has been afforded to American vessels passing through the Sound.

Indeed, this circumstance, Mr. De Kantzow informed me, had been mentioned to him by Lord Castlereagh with no satisfaction.

I fear, however, that the arts and intrigues of our enemy will, if not speedily counteracted, produce a state of things equally unfriendly. I collect from various quarters that considerable dissatisfaction is entertained by the Swedish Government that the United States have not appointed a Minister near it.

The jealousy which has long existed between Sweden and Denmark, is said to have contributed no little to the feeling to which this mission has given rise, seeing that the United States have had a Minister near the Danish Government. Mr. De Kantzow seemed anxious to know whether a Minister was or would be appointed; and I am inclined to believe that his stay here is prolonged on that account.

The Crown Prince is fond of court and splendor; the Government is poor; and, to say nothing of the two great spoliators, the example of Denmark is immediately before it.

I beg to add, that the result of all the information I can collect is, that the fate of all the American property, now in the dominions of Sweden, will depend on the course which the Government of the United States may pursue on this critical and delicate emergency.

I have the honor to be, &c.

R. G. BEASLEY.

Extract of a letter from John Speyer, Esq., Consul of the United States at Stockholm, to the Secretary of State, dated

STOCKHOLM, January 18, 1813.

The Minister of Foreign Affairs, in the course of our conversation yesterday, mentioned that both the King and Prince Royal were desirous to maintain and extend the friendly relations and commercial intercourse now subsisting between us, and intend to send a Minister or Chargé des Affairs to the United States. He would name the person designated for that mission, were it ascertained whether he accepted of it.

Extract of a letter from the same to the same, dated

STOCKHOLM, January 21, 1812.

The gentleman mentioned in my No. 10, as intended to be sent to the United States, is Mr. Kantzow, who lately returned from Brazil, where he resided, Chargé des Affaires of the King, several years. He had before been Consul General of Sweden, in Portugal.

He informed me, yesterday, that he was to go as Chargé des Affaires, which he refused, but consented to accept the appointment as Minister.

From the personal knowledge I have of Mr. Kantzow, I think him well calculated to contribute to the good understanding of our respective Governments.

Extract—Mr. Speyer to the Secretary of State.

STOCKHOLM, March 31, 1812.

On the 24th, the Minister of Foreign Affairs told me that the King had, on that day, directed him to inform me, that he would send Mr. Kantzow as Minister Resident to the United States. I understand that Mr. Kantzow is to leave this with his family, early in May, by way of England.

Extract—Same to the same.

OREBRO, May 18, 1812.

Mr. Kantzow, who is appointed Minister to the United States, is still here; he expects to receive his instructions soon, when he will set out on his voyage.

Extract—From the same to the same.

STOCKHOLM, September 25, 1812.

Mr. Kantzow has received his credentials as Minister Resident at Washington, and was despatched from Orebro on the 15th ultimo. He is now in London, and will probably remain there next winter. The Prince Royal informed me, on the 4th instant, that he had directed Mr. Kantzow to represent to the English Government his desire to see a good understanding restored with the United States.

Extract—From the same to the same, dated

STOCKHOLM, September 25, 1812.

As this Government expect the appointment of a Minister or a Chargé des Affaires, in return for Mr. Kantzow's mission, I have not presented the commission as Consul for this place. I am apprehensive it might be ungraciously received here after their notification of the appointment of a Minister.

NOMINATION OF JONATHAN RUSSELL.

MR. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the committee to whom was referred, on the 2d instant, the nomination of Jonathan Russell, reported:

That, in pursuance of the order of the Senate, the committee met the Secretary of State by appointment at the office of the Department of State, when they were informed by the Secretary, that there was no official denial or admission of Mr. Jonathan Russell, that the allegation of the Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow, referred to, was true; but that he (the Secretary) had a private letter from Mr. Russell subsequent to the allegation of the Duke of Bassano, in which he understood that allegation to be unequivocally denied.

And, on motion, it was ordered that the further consideration of said nomination be postponed.

MR. GOLDSBOROUGH submitted the following motion for consideration, which was read:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient at this time to send a Minister Plenipotentiary to Sweden.

FRIDAY, June 11.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Jonathan Russell, together with the motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH thereon of the 7th instant.

Executive Proceedings.

And, on motion, by Mr. SMITH, it was agreed to take the question on the said nomination by yeas and nays.

A motion was made by Mr. WELLS, that the nomination of Jonathan Russell, and the motion of Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH on the subject, together with the Message of the President of the United States, of the 7th instant, with the communications therein mentioned, be referred to a committee to inquire and report thereon.

And, after debate, on motion, by Mr. GILES, it was agreed that the subject be postponed.

MONDAY, June 14.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the nomination of Jonathan Russell, together with the motion submitted thereon by Mr. WELLS, on the 11th instant, and the motion was amended, and agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the nomination of Jonathan Russell, and the motion of Mr. Goldsborough on the subject, together with the Message of the President of the United States, of the 7th instant, with the communications therein mentioned, be referred to a committee, with instruction respectfully to confer with the President of the United States upon the subject of the said nomination, and report thereon.

Ordered, That Messrs. WELLS, GILES, and KING, be the committee.

TUESDAY, July 6.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I have received from the committee appointed by the resolution of the Senate of the 14th day of June, a copy of that resolution, which authorizes the committee to confer with the President on the subject of the nomination made by him of a Minister Plenipotentiary to Sweden.

Conceiving it to be my duty to decline the proposed conference with the committee, and it being uncertain when it may be convenient to explain to the committee, and through them to the Senate, the grounds of my so doing, I think it proper to address the explanation directly to the Senate. Without entering into a general review of the relations in which the Constitution has placed the several departments of the Government to each other, it will suffice to remark, that the Executive and Senate, in the cases of appointments to office and of treaties, are to be considered independent and co-ordinate with each other. If they agree, the appointments or treaties are made. If the Senate disagree, they fail. If the Senate wish information previous to their final decision, the practice, keeping in view the Constitutional relation of the Senate and Executive, has been, either to request the Executive to furnish it, or refer the subject to a committee of their body to communicate, either formally or informally, with the head of the proper department. The appointment of a committee of the Senate to confer immediately with the Executive himself, appears to lose sight of the co-ordinate relation between the Executive and the Senate, which the Constitution has established, and which ought therefore to be maintained.

The relation between the Senate and House of Representatives, in whom legislative power is concurrently vested, is sufficiently analogous to illustrate that between the Executive and Senate in making appointments and treaties. The two Houses are in like manner independent of and co-ordinate with each other; and the invariable practice of each in appointing committees of conference and consultation is to commission them to confer, not with the co-ordinate body itself, but with a committee of that body: and, although both branches of the Legislature may be too numerous to hold conveniently a conference with committees, were they to be appointed by either to confer with the entire body of the other, it may be fairly presumed, that if the whole number of either branch were not too large for the purpose, the objection to such a conference, being against the principle, as derogatory from the co-ordinate relations of the two Houses, would retain all its force.

I add only that I am entirely persuaded of the purity of the intentions of the Senate, in the course they have pursued on this occasion, and with which my view of the subject makes it my duty not to accord: and that they will be cheerfully furnished with all the suitable information in possession of the Executive, in any mode deemed consistent with the principles of the Constitution, and the settled practice under it.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, July 6, 1813.

THURSDAY, July 8.

Mr. WELLS, from the committee appointed the 14th of June, on the nomination of Jonathan Russell, reported the correspondence between the President of the United States and the committee; also a letter from the Secretary of State to the committee; which were read.

[The copy of the Chairman's letter to the President, communicating a transcript of the resolution of the Senate of the 14th of June, 1813, and inquiring of him when it would be convenient for the President to receive the committee of the Senate, is not on file.]

In answer to the letter above referred to, the following note was received from the President:

"James Madison presents his respects to Mr. Wells, and will receive the committee of the Senate, appointed by their resolution, of the 14th instant, to confer with the President, at 11 o'clock, to-morrow.

"TUESDAY, June 15, 1813."

At the time mentioned in the above note, the committee heard, at the door of the President's house, of his indisposition, and resolved to defer waiting upon him until they were informed of his recovery.

In the afternoon of this day, the chairman of the committee received from the President the following note:

"The President of the United States regrets that the error of his watch, and the precipitancy of his servant, prevented his seeing, at 11 o'clock, to-day, the committee of the Senate, on the subject referred to them.

Executive Proceedings.

"If the state of his health should not permit him to see the committee, he will apprise them of it in time.

"JUNE 16, 1813."

The following are copies of two notes received by the committee from the President of the United States:

"James Madison being too much indisposed to see the committee this morning, is obliged to postpone it until to-morrow, at 11 o'clock.

"THURSDAY, June 17, 1813."

"James Madison is sorry that a continuance of his indisposition will not permit him to see the committee of the Senate to-day, nor can he at present fix a day when it will be in his power.

"FRIDAY MORNING, June 18."

The following is a copy of a letter from Mr. Monroe to the committee:

"DEPARTMENT OF STATE, June 23, 1813.

"GENTLEMEN: The indisposition of the President continuing, I am instructed by him to express to you his great regret at the delay to which it has already subjected the proceedings of the Senate on the nomination of the Minister Plenipotentiary from the United States to Sweden. To prevent any further delay from that cause, he has authorized me to confer with you on that subject, and to communicate to you any information which you may be desirous of obtaining from the Executive relating to it.

"I will have the honor to meet you for this purpose, at such place and hour as you will have the goodness to appoint.

"I have the honor to remain, gentlemen, very respectfully, your obedient, humble servant,

"JAMES MONROE.

"Hon. Messrs. WELLS, GILES, and KING."

The following is an answer from the chairman of the committee:

"COMMITTEE ROOM, June 24, 1813.

"SIR: The committee of the Senate, appointed to confer, respectfully, with the President of the United States, on the nomination made by him of a Minister Plenipotentiary to Sweden, have had the honor, this morning, to receive your letter of yesterday.

"The committee heard with real concern of the continued indisposition of the President; but, as they presume that there are connected with this nomination no considerations of so urgent a nature as to require an immediate decision upon it, they will wait with pleasure for the conference they have been ordered by the Senate to request of the President, until the restoration of his health takes place.

"I have the honor, sir, to be, with the highest consideration, your very obedient servant,

W. H. WELLS,

Chairman Committee of Senate.

Hon. J. MONROE, Sec'y of State.

On motion, by Mr. TAIT, it was agreed that the question on the motion last mentioned, be taken by yeas and nays.

Whereupon, on motion, the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, July 20.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

There being sufficient ground to infer that it is the purpose of the enemy to combine with the blockade of our ports special licenses to neutral vessels, or to British vessels in neutral disguises, whereby they may draw from our country the precise kind and quantity of exports essential to their wants, whilst its general commerce remains obstructed; keeping in view, also, the insidious discrimination between the different ports of the United States; and as such a system, if not counteracted, will have the effect of diminishing very materially the pressure of the war on the enemy, and encouraging a perseverance in it, at the same time that it will leave the general commerce of the United States under all the pressure the enemy can impose, thus subjecting the whole to British regulation, in subserviency to British monopoly; I recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of an immediate and effectual prohibition of exports, limited to a convenient day in their next session, and removable in the meantime in the event of a cessation of the blockade of our ports.

JAMES MADISON.

the House, less depends upon the presiding officer than upon the sense of the necessity of decorum being generally diffused throughout the body. Then only will a deliberative assembly be well governed, and its business agreeably transacted, when each member, identifying the reputation of the body to which he belongs in his own, shall make the preservation of its order an affair of personal and individual concern, and shall render to the Chair a candid, liberal, and unbiassed support. Under the hope and persuasion that you participate with me in these sentiments, I shall proceed to administer the duties you have been pleased to assign me.

The members were then sworn in by States.

The Senate have resolved that two Chaplains, of different denominations, be appointed to Congress during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Mr. DAWSON and Mr. WINTER were appointed a committee, on the part of this House, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communication he may be pleased to make to them.

REFERENCE OF THE MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. DAWSON, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking into consideration the President's Message.

The following resolutions were moved by Mr. DAWSON, and adopted without objection:

Resolved, That so much of the Message as relates to the Military Establishment of the United States be referred to a select committee.

Resolved, That so much as relates to the Naval Establishment, be referred to a select committee.

MAY, 1813.

Reference of the Message.

II. OF R.

Resolved, That so much as relates to the Revenue, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, it was

Resolved, That so much of the Message as relates to Foreign Affairs, be referred to a select committee.

After the adoption of these resolves,

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) rose and adverted to that part of the Message which alludes to the inhumanity of the enemy, expressed his abhorrence of the enormities committed by them, as well in the massacre of our citizens on the Western frontier, as the conflagration of our little towns on the maritime border. The latter outrage had not been pretended to be denied, but had been apologized for (by whom he did not say) on the pretence that our people had first fired on one of their flags. Although he believed the allegation false, he was glad that it was thought necessary to make any apology for it. The facts, however, in both cases, ought to be inquired into and distinctly ascertained. If found to be as public report had stated them, they called for the indignation of all Christendom, and they ought to be embodied in an authentic document, which might perpetuate them on the page of history. These were substantially the remarks, with which Mr. CLAY prefaced the following resolution:

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the spirit and manner in which the war has been waged by the enemy, be referred to a select committee.

The resolution was adopted without opposition or division.

The Committee then rose, and the several resolutions adopted in Committee of the Whole were agreed to by the House.

After these resolutions were agreed to,

Mr. GROSVENOR moved to reconsider the resolution moved in Committee by the Speaker, for the purpose of amending it. Quoting the Message of the President, he said, that the barbarity of the enemy was therein contrasted with the humanity which had characterized the war on our part. He wished to see the evidence on this head also, and therefore was desirous of amending the resolution, if reconsidered, by adding, after the words "by the enemy," the words "and by this nation."

Mr. DESHA suggested the propriety of recommending the subject to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that the mover of this resolve (Mr. Speaker CLAY) might have an opportunity of speaking to it, if reconsidered.

Mr. GROSVENOR said he had not the slightest objection to this course. He also intimated a disposition to withdraw the motion he had made.

Mr. WRIGHT took the floor. He was opposed to the proposed reconsideration, principally because he thought the amendment suggested would cast a reflection, by insinuation, on the conduct of our officers. He was not disposed at this moment to give his sanction to a procedure which would be a libel on our land and naval officers, who had distinguished themselves during the war as much by their humanity as by their valor. The same pen which recorded the great exploits of our Navy would record the humanity along with the bravery of its officers. [The SPEAKER here apprized Mr. W. that he had misunderstood the gentleman from New York, if he had supposed him to have cast any imputation on the conduct of our officers.] Mr. W. then said he wished to know, that he might act understandingly, whether it was intended to insinuate or suggest that there had been any impropriety of conduct on our part; or whether, in referring the subject to a committee, it was intended to state any facts or show any cause in support of that reference. He hoped the resolve would not be reconsidered; although, if there were the slightest ground for such a course, he should not hesitate to institute an inquiry into the conduct of any individual who should have dared to violate the usages of war, so sacredly observed by the Government and our people in general.

Mr. GROSVENOR said he had merely wished, as the object of the honorable Speaker had been avowed on making his motion to be the obtaining of an historical document to perpetuate the barbarity of the enemy, and as in the Message that barbarity had been contrasted with our humanity, that the facts on the one hand should accompany those on the other. He should hope, he said, that the call for such a paper would be far from presenting a libel on our officers, as the gentleman from Maryland seemed to suppose. Mr. G. was not however solicitous about the fate of his motion, for which he said he felt but little anxiety.

The question for reconsideration was then taken and lost—yeas 62, nays 74.

Mr. Calhoun, Mr. Grundy, Mr. Desha, Mr. Jackson, of Virginia, Mr. Ingersoll, Mr. Fisk, of New York, and Mr. Webster, were appointed the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. Troop, Mr. Sevier, Mr. Wright, Mr. Stuart, Mr. Taylor, Mr. Tallmadge, and Mr. Tannehill, were appointed the Committee on the Military Establishment.

Mr. Nelson, Mr. Ward, of Massachusetts, Mr. Alston, Mr. Stockton, Mr. Skinner, Mr. Davis, of Pennsylvania, and Mr. Post, were appointed the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. Macon, Mr. Forsyth, Mr. Wright, Mr. Gaston, Mr. Clarke, Mr. Humphreys, and Mr. Cooper, were appointed the Committee on the spirit and manner in which the war has been waged by the enemy.

THURSDAY, May 27.

Another member, to wit: from Pennsylvania, JOHN M. HYNEMAN, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. GHOLSON presented a petition of John Taliaferro, of Virginia, complaining of the undue election and return of John P. Hungerford, as one of the Representatives from that State, and praying that an examination may take place, and that he may be admitted to a seat in the House in the place of the said John P. Hungerford.

Mr. EPPES presented a petition of Burwell Bassett, of the State of Virginia, complaining of the undue election and return of Thomas M. Bayly, as one of the Representatives from that State, and praying that an examination may take place, and that he may be admitted to a seat in the House, in the place of the said Thomas M. Bayly.

Ordered, That the said petitions be severally referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. JENNINGS presented the memorial of the Legislative Council and House of Representatives of Indiana Territory, stating that, from the harassed situation of that Territory, the ordinary avocations of the people have been interrupted, and the people disabled from making payments for the public lands they have purchased, and praying that further time may be allowed therefor.—The petition was referred to the Committee of Public Lands.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have appointed a committee on their part, jointly, with such committee as this House may appoint, to have the direction of the money appropriated to the purchase of books and maps for the two Houses of Congress.

The House proceeded to consider the message, and concurred therein; and Mr. SEYBERT, Mr. ROBERTSON, and Mr. STURGES, were appointed of the committee on the part of the House.

FRIDAY, May 28.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, ABIEL WOOD; from Pennsylvania, JOHN REA and JOHN WILSON; from Virginia, DANIEL SHEFFEY; from South Carolina, WILLIAM LOWNDES; from Georgia, BOLLING HALL, and from Kentucky, STEPHEN ORMSBY; appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

After the reception of sundry petitions, the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, May 31.

Several other members, to wit: from Maryland, CHARLES GOLDSBOROUGH; from North Carolina, JOHN CULPEPER; and from South Carolina, LANGDON CHEVES, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. GRUNDY presented a petition of William Kelly, of the State of Tennessee, praying to be admitted to a seat in this House, in the place of THOMAS K. HARRIS, one of the Representatives from that State.—Referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. JENNINGS presented a petition of the Legislature of the Indiana Territory, praying Congress to confirm the sale of certain lands sold by the said Legislature for the benefit of an university in said Territory.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting a copy of the report of the land commissioners for the district of Kaskaskia. The letter was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a port of entry and delivery at the town of Mobile, in the Mississippi Territory, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

STENOGRAPHERS.

Mr. GROSVENOR presented the petition of George Richards, stating, that he had during the last session reported the proceedings of the House for the Federal Republican newspaper; and that on application at the present session for the like privilege, he had been excluded by the decision of the honorable SPEAKER; and praying to be admitted as heretofore for the purpose of reporting debates.

Mr. G. moved to refer the petition to a select committee.

Mr. GRUNDY remarked that this was one of those questions which there was no occasion to refer to a committee, as the House were as well qualified to decide on it as any committee could be.

Mr. GROSVENOR urged the reference of this memorial to a committee, as the best mode of ascertaining whether any stenographers could be admitted on the floor, consistently with the convenience of the House, and a course which would be, perhaps, more decorous to the Chair than any other.

Mr. TROUP suggested the propriety of referring the memorial to a Committee of the Whole. He said the paper, and the mode of its introduction into the House, were calculated directly or indirectly to convey to the House and to the public an intimation that the Speaker had acted with injustice in relation to the individual petitioning. It seemed proper, therefore, that the Speaker should have an opportunity of explaining the grounds on which he had acted.

Mr. WRIGHT was opposed to any reference of the petition at all. It was a subject belonging peculiarly to the Speaker himself to decide on. The words of the rules of the House were: "The Speaker may admit stenographers wishing to take debates," &c. The admission of them was a mere indulgence, which the Speaker might extend to such persons as he thought proper. It could not be the right of every editor in the United States to send a stenographer into this House; and he believed the honorable Speaker would feel no hesitation in declaring the motives which induced him to exclude the petitioner. Mr. W. felt himself warranted on this occasion in making one or two remarks in relation to the paper for which this application had been made. He said that it had been in the practice of publishing a report of speeches on one side only. Who were the editors of this paper? It was not known. They did not appear on the face of the paper.

Stenographers.

H. OF R.

In an N. B. to a letter of Cobbett to the Prince Regent, he had declared that these men were in British pay; that the Federal Republican was edited under British influence. They had not thought proper to institute a suit against Porcupine for this charge. A similar charge had been made by the papers in this country. They had instituted a suit against one of them—"The American;" but, as he had been informed, had discontinued it. Mr. Speaker, I recollect a speech of your's which ought to have been recorded in letters of gold; it was sought after with avidity, but it was not to be found in the Federal Republican, for whom this Mr. Richards then reported. Was this fair or impartial conduct? Mr. W. adverted to an article, in which the editors of the Federal Republican had recommended any man, whose letters had been opened by the American agent for cartels at Annapolis, to horsewhip the President for it. He also read part of an article which appeared in the Federal Republican of this morning, in relation to the defence of Baltimore, and reprobated it in strong terms. The nation would applaud the decision of the Speaker on excluding this stenographer from the House.

Mr. HANSON had hoped the question, would pass off without the necessity of any interference on his part—thus saving his breath. Being in such a state of extreme debility as to forbid any active, personal, or intellectual exertion, he would gladly have been relieved from the necessity of taking a share in the debate. But he could not look on with indifference, betraying a treacherous composure, while other gentlemen bore the heat and burden of the contest. Such a course would subject him to a suspicion of something more than delicacy. No; he was constrained by peculiar circumstances to take the floor; he felt himself bound to enter his protest against an act, in his judgment arbitrary and oppressive, partial and unjust; oppressive, as related to the very respectable gentleman petitioning for relief, and partial as regarded the minority, and a large body of people, in a considerable section of country, accustomed to look for information exclusively through that channel, now arbitrarily attempted to be blocked up; that the circulation of the journal in question, he believed, exceeded that of any other in the Union.

Mr. H. then stated the circumstances of the case; the admission of Mr. Richards last year, and the arrangement which now excluded him, confining the admission of stenographers to three Democrats and one Federalist, who was only a reporter nominally, giving a rough sketch of the proceedings, but not pretending to write out debates. The talents with which the paper (the Alexandria Gazette) was conducted, and the respectability of the editors he admitted, but it was a mere mockery to say the Speaker had given the minority a reporter, while the Treasury bench had three reporters.

Mr. H. referred the House to the journals of the first session of the seventh Congress, when the subject of admitting stenographers was first taken up. He stated that case at length. He then asked, after this decision, when all the old members now in Congress on the other side of the House, were against giving any discretion to the Speaker, in limiting the number or saying who they should be,—after this, and when so much has been often said about the Federal reign of terror, it is now attempted to exclude the stenographers of one party, and to keep information from the people. Stenographers might be banished to the gallery, because obnoxious to that side of the House; and this side of the House, entitled to equal rights, might be put to inconvenience, but the light of truth could not be shut out from the people. It might as well be attempted to supersede, by a visionary human code, the fixed laws of nature—to change the principles of gravitation, and cause lead to ascend, or sparks to fly downwards; it might as well be attempted to shift the bed of the Chesapeake, or change the course of old Potomac, as attempt to crush the spirit of opposition, to stifle investigation, change the nature of truth, or shut out its light from the people. Vain expectation! You may bar up your doors, nail down your windows, block up the chimneys, stop every crevice in this spacious hall, cork even the keyhole, still will the rays of resistless truth pierce these solid walls, and shed their light upon the land.

Mr. H. said, in relation to government, the people, their rights, and immunities, and public liberty, he confessed he entertained some old fashioned republican opinions, not yet grown entirely into disuse, which he could not shake off, or exchange for the new-fangled notions of modern times. He need not remind the House, that as yet no privileged order was known to the written Constitution of the country; that its framers contemplated mildness, equality, equity, and justice, as the distinguishing characteristic features of all laws enacted, and rules and regulations made in its virtue; not for the particular exclusive convenience of a favored class of the community, whose passions and domineering dispositions are to be gratified at the cost of others' rights. He need not remind the House, that as yet no written or known law existed to dry up the fountains of intelligence, or confine the use of their wholesome waters to the King, his household, and the tumultuous retinue at his heels, who keep the requisite supply of lip-service and "eye-service which the worldlings pay to power." He need not tell the Chair, that the press in this free country, as yet, had no prefect set over it by law, and he cherished a devout hope that the House, constituted even as it was, would think none necessary, though the anointed should sigh for the distinction of being placed at the head of the prefecture.

Mr. H. said, when the celebrated Roman usurper had passed the Rubicon, and was tracking his way to the Capitol to possess himself of the treasury, he was met at the door by a stubborn tribune of the people, who alleged, that the principles of a free form of government, and the laws, were against such an outrage. "The laws! the laws!" said Cæsar—"arms and laws do 'not flourish together. If you are not pleased with what I am about, you have only to withdraw. Indeed war will not bear much liberty of speech. You, and all whom I have found exciting a spirit of faction against me, are at my disposal.' Had you, sir, been Metellus, said Mr. H., how would you have acted? Had I been Metellus, I would have told the usurper, "I am not pleased with what you are about, but I will not withdraw. I will do my duty to the people, and maintain the laws of my country; at the same moment I would have struck down the daring usurper. All who are found exciting a spirit of faction against me are at my disposal, and shall be treated accordingly." How like the language of the present day. A spirit of faction! a spirit of faction against usurpation, tyranny, oppression, and lawless violence. "They who are not for me are against me, and shall be treated accordingly." They who continue to exercise the freedom of speech, to assert and maintain the liberty of the press, to support the Constitution in its pristine unsunned purity—they who constitutionally oppose the worst acts of a bad administration, are to have their voices stifled by "the cord of justice." For one, I shall defend my rights at every hazard.

Mr. H. said he knew the power of the Chair, and was not ignorant of the source from which it was derived; from the same originally pure and healthy fountain from which also flowed his rights as a member of the House, and the rights of the humblest individual out of it. To rules and regulations constitutionally adopted for the government of the House, and impartially and constitutionally enforced, he would pay at all times a scrupulous and implicit obedience, but he would resist oppression; he would part with his mortal power of respiration, with his last breath, short as might be the number of his days, before he would submit to the slightest encroachment from authority—he would meet opposition in the eye. A rule of the House had none of that plastic virtue—was not that convenient thing which could be converted into a sort of political parasol, to be distended and collapsed as caprice or expediency might suggest, to shelter one side of the House from the rays of authority, while the other was left bare-headed and exposed to the scorching beams of royal indignation, to the peltings of the pitiless storm.

He said, if the act of which the minority, possessing equal rights with the majority, complained so justly, was done under a rule of the House, and that rule had been abused, it was in the power of the House, for the furtherance of justice, to dispense with, enlarge, or abolish it, so as to extend the relief prayed for. He supposed the case of a new order of things, compelling the Speaker to give way to a successor of different political persuasion, and asked how the gentlemen on the other side of the House would feel, would act, if no other stenographers were admitted in the House but those agreeable to the majority? The country would ring with their complaints—the clamor would resound through the Union.

And yet such was the case with the present minority, excepting a nominal reporter. How then ought they to feel—how act—when thus trampled on by an overbearing majority, disposed to put their heels upon their adversaries' necks, whilst protected in their own rights?

Mr. H. concluded by saying, he knew he forgot what he owed to his own character, in noticing the aspersions of the member from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) but he had no hesitation in pronouncing the charge of foreign influence against the Federal Republican a base calumny.

Mr. GROSVENOR declared, that the inflammable state of the body and mind of the gentleman from Maryland, should communicate no intemperate heat to him; nor should the turbulent and indecent invective of the gentlemen drive him into a course of conduct inconsistent with the respect due from him, not, indeed, to the gentleman, but to the Speaker and to the House.

He would not pay either the head or the heart of the Speaker so bad a compliment as to suppose the gentleman from Maryland had even glanced at the real motive which induced the order of exclusion referred to in the petition. For, Mr. G. asked, what possible connexion could exist between the case of the petitioner and the political character of the Federal Republican Gazette? Was there any gentleman on that floor, with the single exception of the fiery gentleman from Maryland, who would dare to avow that all reporters on that floor must be the devotees and tools of the majority; and that all the gazettes which did not offer daily incense to the idol of the day, were to be denounced on that floor—to be proscribed and persecuted by that House? Sir, I have better hopes, nay better certainty of the dispositions of the gentlemen who sit around me.

But in truth, and in fact, Mr. Richards was neither directly nor indirectly interested in that paper. He was a reporter, at a fixed salary; and so correct had his deportment always been, both as a gentleman in that House, and as a reporter of its proceedings and debates, that the tongue even of party violence had never heretofore uttered a complaint against him in either capacity. It was equally impracticable and useless to give all the speeches uttered here at full length; but their substance, without prejudice and without partiality, he had always reported. In extracting speeches from other papers, more on the one side than on the other might have been published in that paper. This was a matter wholly in the discretion of the editors, and for their conduct they were not responsible to the gentleman from Maryland or to the Speaker of this House. Like all other editors in these times of party violence, they sought to fill their columns with sentiments in accordance with their own. But, unlike most editors, they had at all times openly and boldly professed their principles; have defended them with a firmness and ability never excelled, and have been at all times ready to seal them with their blood. But, Mr. G. said, improper and irrelevant as all this manifestly was, the gentleman from Maryland had pushed his denunciation a step further. He had denounced the Federal Republican newspaper as being in British pay.

Mr. G. repeated, that no violence of the gentleman from Maryland should seduce him to imitate so bad an example. But, Mr. Speaker, said Mr. G., what is the proof of this outrageous calumny? Not surely its opposition to the measures of administration, nor yet the character of its political opinions—for in these it agrees with the best and the wisest patriots who ever adorned this country. Mr. G. said that the gentleman had pursued a different course to attain his object. He had introduced to the House a witness, a living witness, to establish his accusation.

And, as if miracles were never to cease, that witness is no other than William Cobbett, a man whom the political friends of the gentleman would better recognise under the name of "Peter Porcupine." Mr. G. asked, how long it was since this witness had become credible, in the opinion of the gentleman from Maryland? And at what period was he transformed into a good Republican authority? When did the accuser and the witness join hands, and begin to walk together in political unity and peace? Mr. G. had supposed that a Republican of the old school would have balanced long before he would have introduced so dangerous a witness to sustain his charges, because it is a maxim, as well of common sense as of law, that all he swears must be received as true, or repudiated as false. Mr. G. asked, if the gentleman would be hung on the first horn of the dilemma? Let him, then, travel back with me a few years to the early writings of that political renegado; and Cobbett himself shall know all the members of the present Administration, the veriest tools and satellites of France.

Nay, Mr. G. said, he would not answer for it, but the same witness should convict the gentleman himself of having been the mere creature of French influence. Would the gentleman, then, credit or discredit his own witness? He left him to choose his own alternative. But, one piece of advice he would offer the gentleman, never to sustain another calumny by a witness so foul, so rotten, so dangerous.

The denunciations of Peter Porcupine are the strongest proofs of worth, merit, and ability. I thought so when he was shooting the envenomed quills of the Porcupine in America. I think so now, that he is pouring forth the muddy torrent of slander and falsehood in his native country.

Mr. G. said, he had presented the petition, because he believed its prayer was reasonable; because, in his opinion, the exclusion of Mr. Richards was a hardship on himself, oppressive on the minority, and deeply injurious to the public.

If another reporter might be admitted without inconvenience to the House—and, on examination, not a doubt could remain that he might—then this exclusion was an unnecessary hardship on the petitioner. He understood that the Federal stenographer admitted, never attempted to report debates; the minority, therefore, were oppressively deprived of a reporter;—nearly six thousand of the Federal Republican newspaper were distributed through every part of the country—and three times that number of papers in distant States depended on that paper for information of the proceedings of this House. At this session, interesting and important as it is, when you are about to heap tax on tax to support this disastrous war, to spread taxgatherers through every portion of the continent, is it not utterly subversive of the rights of the people suddenly to obstruct this wide channel of information, to draw even this narrow curtain between your conduct and the public eye? It had been suggested this course was calculated to cast a censure upon the Speaker. He said, no such idea was suggested by the petition, nor had he in any manner questioned the motives of the Speaker. It would be indecent and unjust, in this stage of the business, to cast one shade upon the purity of his motives. He said, he only questioned the correctness of his judgment. He charged the Speaker with no crime, nor, strictly speaking, with any impropriety of conduct; but he did charge him with an error of judgment, in excluding George Richards from the floor, at the same time that he admitted three Democratic and but one Federal reporter. That judgment was subject to revision, and that error to correction in the House.

And Mr. G. called on the House to send the petition to a special committee, whose report might be committed to a Committee of the whole House. Then, said he, the Speaker will be on the floor, and may assign the motives and reasons which induced him to exclude Mr. Richards from the House.

Mr. WRIGHT said, he had stated that the paper appeared to have no editors; that Cobbett had told the Prince Regent that its putative editors were in British pay. He stated that he had been informed the "American" had charged them with being under British influence; that they had instituted a suit against the editors of that paper, but had discontinued it. The gentleman (Mr. HANSON) could tell whether the information was true or not. He had thought it his duty to state it. If he had wounded the feelings of any gentleman, he knew where to seek the remedy. [The SPEAKER called to order.] He had not said whether he believed the charge; but he would now tell the gentleman that he did believe the editors of the Federal Republican were under British influence; that the paper was corruptly published; and, what he conscientiously believed, he was prepared to seal with his blood.

Mr. HANSON rejoined, in the following manner: In his beautiful little poem, entitled "Retrospection," Cumberland somewhere says—

"I've heard, and silently sate by, the whilst Dogmatic ignorance, when proudly back'd
By an imposing gravity of face,
And copious flow of senatorial wig,
Passed off for argument, and seen, withal,
The sycophant, who in his heart despis'd
And ridicul'd the nonsense, smile assent."

Now, sir, once for all, I wish it to be distinctly understood, that nothing which can fall from that quarter, (pointing to Mr. WRIGHT,) nothing which that member could think, utter, or do, can possibly disturb my breast, or make the slightest impression upon my feelings. This is the first and last time I can bestow upon him any notice whatever. The charge of foreign influence, I again pronounce groundless and false. The ravings and wild effusions of Cobbett, I have never read, nor regard more than the ravings of the member—still less, should I think of travelling to England or Baltimore, in pursuit of justice; although it is proper to say, the suit against the “American” has never been discontinued, with the knowledge or privity of the editors. In Boston, a specific charge of corruption was made by two ministerial journals, and quickly after the impetration of a writ on an action of slander, the allegation was retracted, and a full apology publicly made. The names of the editors were, long ago, in possession of the member, and could, at all times, be obtained, when asked for.—Mr. H., being exhausted, took his seat.

The question was then taken on referring the petition to a committee of the whole House, and carried by a considerable majority.

It was made the order for to-day in preference to to-morrow, the question on to-morrow, the day proposed by Mr. GROSVENOR, having been negatively, 90 to 74—many of the minority voting in the affirmative.

The House then resumed the question respecting stenographers; and,

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, resolved into a Committee of the Whole, on the petition of George Richards, this day presented and referred.

The petition having been again read, Mr. GROSVENOR moved the following resolution:

“Resolved, That George Richards be admitted on the floor of this House as a stenographer, and that the Speaker be requested to assign him a place thereon.”

Mr. CLAY, (Speaker,) after observing that, in his opinion, an importance had been given to this petition which did not well comport with the dignity of the House, stated the ground on which the decision had been made by him, of which the petitioner complained; which was simply this: that, in consequence of the recent alterations in the House, seats had been arranged for but four stenographers; and to those places he had assigned the applicants according to seniority; all of whom having been of longer standing than Mr. R., he had by this arrangement been excluded. If the House should deem it proper to admit others than those now on the floor, he hoped they would designate the stations they should occupy, &c.

Mr. GASTON said, he was one of those who had voted for a reference of Mr. Richards’s petition to a Committee of the Whole. He deemed the subject deserving of every attention, because it was intimately connected with the first principles of a Republican Government, freedom of discussion, and publicity of proceedings. He had also been desirous to afford the Speaker an opportunity of explaining the motives which had governed his decision. He had not believed that these motives were of the kind which had been confidently anticipated by a political friend of the Speaker’s, in his vehement opposition to the reference. He had not supposed it possible, that the Speaker of the House of Representatives could lend himself, in his official capacity, to the suppression of an obnoxious paper. He rejoiced to find that his opinion in this respect was well founded.

The Speaker has explicitly informed us, that his determination was influenced solely by a regard for the convenience of the House. The motive was assuredly correct, and if the opinion to which it led varied from that of the Committee, this variance should excite no surprise, nor should a decision on their part favorable to Mr. Richards, be viewed as overruling or implicating the decision of the Chair. Charged with the responsibility of superintending the convenience of the House, it was natural for the Speaker to lean, he ought to lean, to the side of those whose accommodation it was his province to consult. But when a direct application is made to the members themselves, a scrupulous apprehension of possible inconvenience cannot operate. In the Chair, it is a proper and becoming sentiment—in the members themselves it would evince an overweening selfishness, neither liberal nor dignified. An objection had been intimated by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) though it had not been pressed, that the applicant, in the technical sense of the word, was not a stenographer. Mr. G. understood that Mr. Richards did not write short hand. He made brief notes of the remarks of gentlemen, which enabled him afterwards, by the assistance of his memory, to write out their speeches entire. In this he had shown an accuracy which gentlemen on all sides had highly commended. But Mr. Richards comes as completely within the letter of the rule, as three out of four of the reporters already on the floor, for but one of them it is understood writes short hand; and as completely within the spirit of the rule as any of them. The object is to report correctly the debates of the House, and it cannot be material whether that object be effected by an abridgment of each word, or by an abridgment of the sentences of the speaker. Did the illustrious Dr. Johnson report the debates of the British Parliament with less ability, or less correctness, because he did not write short hand? Would we refuse to him, if now an applicant, the permission granted to those we see in the boxes, because he was not a stenographer?

Mr. G. hoped that the session would commence with an act of liberality on the part of the majority, which he could not but believe would have an auspicious effect on the future proceedings of the House. Majorities are frequently tempted to exercise their power with a high hand. Minorities always suspect them of a disposition to oppress. A jealousy on this head will exist, often an unfounded jealousy. Let it be removed early by a course of conciliation, and a different sentiment is inspired. Forbearance on one hand will inspire courtesy on the other; and although differences, and important differences, would yet remain, yet a spirit of generous contest will forbid all unnecessary altercation or wanton opposition. On his feelings he was certain such an impression would be made; and he could not but believe it would also be made on those of the gentlemen with whom he was accustomed to act.

Mr. WEBSTER was glad that the Speaker had treated this subject on the ground of inconvenience only. The reasons which he had given for the exclusion of the petitioner, were such as he should have expected from a person filling the Chair of this House. He thought that the petitioner might be admitted without inconvenience; and as he had not been charged with unfairly reporting the proceedings of the House, as he reported with ability, he hoped he would be admitted. The true ground to put the question upon was its practicability. If the reporter abused the indulgence shown him, there were enough in the House, accustomed to watch with a guarded vigilance the proceedings on this side the House, not to let slip an opportunity to urge their complaints.

Mr. CALHOUN denied the position that there was room sufficient, and he did not see how the Speaker could act otherwise. He thought it would be highly improper to assign him a seat on the floor; this would be making a privileged stenographer, and giving him advantages which none of the others possessed. He would have an opportunity of overhearing the private conversation of members, as he would have to be placed in a situation where gentlemen resorted to express their opinions of pending measures, and then he would be able to penetrate all their measures. He thought the gallery a proper place; the debates could be as well heard in the gallery as any where, and writing be done with equal velocity. The particular qualities of ability and impartiality had been much dwelt upon; he denied both. The debates in that paper had been confined to one side, and it was well known the gentleman did not write short hand, but was merely a notetaker, &c. He did not make use of this as an argument against the admission of Mr. Richards, but as his friends had grounded his claim upon superior talents and impartiality, he could not do less than bring the true state of the affair before the House.

Mr. ROBERTS regretted that this subject should have been agitated, as it would produce irritation. The necessity for limitation was apparent. Gentlemen wished to resort to the fire in Winter time, which was the ordinary time of their session; for many of their seats were not tenable by the most robust constitutions when the weather was intense. Their conversations there would be overheard by the reporter, and they might expect to see it published the next day in the gazettes. The convenience of the House had to be consulted. This required that there should be a limitation. His opinion was, that the reporters should be confined to the galleries altogether. This was the practice in England, where their privileges were so limited as to prevent them from using pen and ink. That reporters were at all admitted within the area of the House was a matter of courtesy and indulgence.

Mr. EPPES was willing to extend the same privileges to Mr. Richards that others enjoyed, and if there was not sufficient room he was disposed to make a provision for his accommodation. But, if we proceeded according to the resolution of the gentleman from New York, the House might be called upon every day to decide on the case of a second Mr. Richards. He was in favor of a general extension of this privilege. He did not wish to conceal his sentiments and opinions from the world, he would rather court investigation than shrink from it, and so he presumed would every honest man. He therefore moved the following:

"Resolved, That accommodation be made for additional stenographers on the floor of this House."

Mr. GROSVENOR acquiesced in this resolution.

Mr. INGERSOLL did not suppose this morning that the present subject would have taken the deflected course it had taken. He had not, therefore, paid much attention to the discussion. His indisposition to inculcate the decision of the Speaker on the one hand, or to impair the claim of the petitioner or the minority on the other, induced him to wish the subject to be postponed for consideration. He moved that it lie on the table.—Negatived.

Mr. GHOLSON moved its indefinite postponement.

Mr. GROSVENOR opposed this motion; and it was negatived.

Mr. ROBERTS moved that the House adjourn—lost, 63 to 93.

The question to lie on the table was put and lost—ayes 66.

The question to postpone it indefinitely was put and lost—71 to 91.

The question to adjourn was renewed and lost—ayes 64.

The question then recurred upon the amendment to insert "two," which was lost.

Mr. BIBB moved to amend the resolution by making it to read "two" additional reporters on the floor or elsewhere. This would be complying with the language of the rules of the House.

Mr. GASTON wished the gentleman would withdraw or modify his motion so as not to prescribe the place.

Mr. BIBB modified by striking out the words "on the floor or elsewhere," but he said he felt it necessary to state he should vote against the resolution in any shape; but if it passed he wished it made as perfect as possible.

Mr. ROBERTS moved to amend by inserting "in the galleries."

Mr. MACON opposed this amendment, as it would make a difference between the stenographers; some would be admitted within the area of the Hall, while others would be placed in the gallery. He wished them all to be placed on the same footing.

Mr. ROBERTS explained this to be his intention, &c.

Mr. CALHOUN moved to adjourn.—Carried.

TUESDAY, June 1.

Mr. HALL, of Georgia, presented a petition of Daniel Newman, of the State of Georgia, praying compensation for his servant, who was killed in the expedition commanded by the petitioner against the Seminole Indians, during the last campaign.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTSON, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a District Court in the Mississippi Territory, with leave to report by bill, or otherwise; and Mr. ROBERTSON, Mr. TELFAIR, Mr. BOWEN, Mr. COOPER, and Mr. WARD of Massachusetts, were appointed the committee.

A motion was made by Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, to amend the Standing Rules and Orders of the House, by adding the following thereto:

"An additional standing committee shall be appointed at the commencement of each session, viz:

"A Committee on the Judiciary, to consist of seven members.

"It shall be the duty of the said Committee on the Judiciary to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things touching judicial proceedings as shall be presented, or may come in question, and be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereupon, together with such propositions relative thereto, as to them shall seem expedient."

Ordered, That the said amendment do lie on the table.

STENOGRAPHERS.

The case of George Richards was again brought up.

Mr. BIBB's amendment was put and lost, 70 to 75.

Mr. STOCKTON moved to strike out "additional stenographers" and insert "additional accommodation be made in the gallery for stenographers."

Mr. BIBB moved to strike out the whole of the resolution from the word "resolved," and insert "that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted."

Mr. CALHOUN spoke with some warmth against the petition, urging that the Speaker was not to be reduced to the level of the petitioner—that he claimed a seat as a matter of right. Whence these high pretensions? He had been excluded by an arrangement of the Speaker—as if he had a right to be admitted! He denied the qualifications of Mr. Richards as a stenographer, upon the score of ability and impartiality.

Mr. GASTON said he rose with reluctance, to claim the attention of the House. He was sensible that the discussion had been prolonged until it became fatiguing. He was unwilling also to be accessary in bringing down upon the House a repetition of the sentence, which a self-created censor had pronounced against them, of having "lost a day." But he was disposed to examine the train of argument which had been pursued by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, with an ingenuity and a plausibility which rendered it deserving of notice. He had listened to the gentleman with attention—with freedom from bias—but certainly not conviction. A fallacy pervaded the whole of his argument. It was to be found in every of his premises, and necessarily led to error in his conclusion.

It is assumed by the gentleman, as a first principle, that the Speaker of this House is irresponsible except for wrongs done to the members of this House. This is not the gentleman's language, but it is clearly his meaning. I would not for worlds mistake it. Whence is this position derived? That the Speaker is not accountable to any other tribunal than this House for wrongs committed as Speaker, is indeed true. But where is the principle to be found which restricts his accountability to wrongs committed on the members? If, in the exercise of a discretionary authority confided to him by the House, the Speaker errs, and the consequence is inconvenience or injury to any individual of the nation, high or low, private or public, it is an obvious dictate of justice, that the House should hasten to redress the injury, to remove the inconvenience resulting from this error. The Speaker is their agent—their organ. His acts are to be deemed theirs. Whenever those acts are disapproved of, the House will, and ought, to disavow them. But how has it become necessary to inquire into this doctrine? There is nothing in the resolution now before us, and which the gentleman from Georgia proposes to amend, that calls for such a discussion. Without inquiring whether the decision of the Speaker be right or wrong, without pronouncing an opinion on the individual case of Mr. Richards, it directs that arrangements shall be made for the accommodation of additional stenographers. By such a resolution the difficulties of the Speaker will be removed, and the case of Mr. Richards again submitted to him, after the removal of those difficulties.

But, says the honorable gentleman, this resolution, growing out of the petition of Mr. Richards, is substantially a compliance with that petition, and an affirmation that the Speaker has done him wrong as he complains. Here, it seems to me, the gentleman errs in point of fact. Mr. Richards states the facts of his case, simply and truly, without the allegation of a wrong being committed by the Speaker. The mistake of the gentleman in this respect, seems to be entirely founded on an overstrained and erroneous construction of the word "exclude." Surely the gentleman has not exercised in this particular his usual critical acumen. Neither in common language, nor in strict etymology, does the word exclude, imply the idea of previous possession. Are not strangers excluded from the floor of this hall? Yet is it hence to be inferred that they ever had possession of it? No, sir, we exclude, when we inhibit entrance—when we shut out—when we refuse admittance. We expel, when we drive out of possession. Nor does Mr. Richards represent the use of this floor as a right to which he is entitled, but expressly as a privilege, which was accorded at the last session, and which he prays may be renewed at this. There is not, sir, to my apprehension, anything in the petition of Stenographers.

H. OF R.

Mr. Richards, which can shock the most fastidious delicacy—the most scrupulous regard for the dignity of the Chair.

These are the simple facts of the case. Under an order of the House directing stenographers to be admitted by the Speaker when it can be done without inconvenience, the petitioner made application to be received as such. This application was rejected, because, as the Speaker informs us, the boxes erected could accommodate but four, and the four admitted had prior claims. The Committee of the Whole recommend additional boxes, that more may be accommodated; and to this we must not accede, because it will insinuate a doubt, whether the Speaker was right in the opinion, that the boxes erected could accommodate but four! This inference may with some appear to be fairly deduced, but in my judgment it is anything but logical.

Mr. GROSVENOR apologized for again rising in the debate. Nothing, he said, but some misrepresentations of the spirit of the petition which he had presented, and some reflections on the course which he had pursued, could have induced him to rise in this protracted period of the discussion.

The amendment, said Mr. G. is a flat denial of the petition—and what are the reasons advanced by the gentleman from South Carolina in support of it. "The petitioner, he says, claims a right on that floor, and complains that the Speaker has injured him by violating that right, and that he claims redress for the injury."

Mr. Speaker, not one word or suggestion of the kind is to be found in the petition. These are notions which the gentleman has conjured up in his own fancy. The petitioner neither claims a right on this floor, nor does he complain of any injury to that right. The petition is a simple and respectful statement of undeniable facts. He states that, at the last session, by permission of the Speaker, he enjoyed the privilege of a place on the floor as a reporter for the Federal Republican newspaper; that, at the commencement of this session, he applied for the same privilege; that he was informed by the Sergeant-at-Arms that he, by a new arrangement and by order of the Speaker, was excluded—he then prays the House to grant him the privilege which the Speaker had refused.

Now, sir, said Mr. G., where did the honorable gentleman from South Carolina find the claim of right, and the complaint of injury, about which he had spoken so warmly. Mr. G. repeated, that it was no where to be found in the speech of the gentleman. But, said Mr. G., if it were otherwise, I deny, I utterly deny the humiliating doctrine, that the Speaker of this House, or any other public man in this nation, be he high or be he low, is not responsible for any injuries he may inflict even on the meanest citizen.

What new Republican doctrine is this, sir? How long is it since any man has risen, in this country, so high in dignity and in power that he can with impunity trample down the rights of any citizen? In what article of the Republican code is this fundamental maxim of despotism to be found? No, sir, gentlemen mistake the nature of our free institutions, if they believe them contaminated with principles like these. Sir, said Mr. G., the time has not arrived in this country when any man has risen, or can rise above control, and set at defiance responsibility. Dress him in what robes you may, exalt him where you can, he will find a tribunal still above him, to which he must answer, and to which he shall finally submit.

The rights of the humblest beggar who crawls on the earth, are as strictly guarded by the laws as those of the supplest minion who crouches at the footstool of power. The chains of the Constitution are around us all, and they never shall be loosened until liberty sinks in a general convulsion of society. The struggles of aspiring men, to shake them off, shall but draw them closer, and render them stronger.

The Speaker, sir, of this House is amenable to any man for an injury inflicted in the course of his duty. But he is amenable in a particular manner to this House and within these walls. I know, sir, he is not to be questioned without these walls, for anything which he does within them as Speaker of the House. But, sir, the same rule applies to every member on this floor. You and I, sir, in this respect are on the same list, we are both protected. Does it hence follow, that we are not responsible within these walls and to this House for improper conduct to any citizen, however humble his station in life? and is it improper when such a citizen has sustained an injury from the Speaker, in the administration of the duties assigned him by this House, that he should petition the House for remedy and redress?

At what era in our Government was it, that this revolution in affairs took place? How long since has it been a crime, by a respectful petition, to state a grievance to the only body that can grant redress? But the petitioner and the Speaker are at issue say gentlemen. Well, and what then? Is your Speaker, I again ask, either irresponsible for his conduct, or above the control of the House? Is it meant that when the Speaker ascends the Chair, he shall be clothed with despotic power, and be invested with the attribute of infallibility? I am sure, sir, the honorable Speaker himself will reject all such claims. He will claim no exemption from a fair responsibility. It is human to err—an exaltation to the Speaker's Chair, does not exempt from the frailties of humanity.

But, said Mr. G., it is contended that "this complaint is founded on a rule of this House. These rules are solely for the members, and a violation of them cannot be noticed but by a member; therefore the petition itself was disorderly, and ought to be rejected." That no one can take cognizance of and enforce the rules of this House, but itself, is certainly true. But it is no less true, that if a right or privilege is secured to any citizen, by any law, whether by act of the legislature, or in the form of a rule of this House, such right and privilege is sacred, until the act be repealed or the rule dispensed with by the same power that gave them existence. And if the Speaker, or any other man, violates that privilege or right, any one injured must have redress—in the case of a legislative act by a court of law—in the case of a rule, by petition to this House. In every shape therefore, these doctrines are incorrect and cannot be endured, unless we are prepared to offer up the rights of our constituents on the altar of dignity and power.

Mr. G. then contended, that in this petition there was no claim of right, no impeachment of the Speaker's motives, no allegation of injury. Mr. Richards prayed for admission with the other stenographers, upon the same footing, and subject to the same control. It could not seriously be contended, that one additional seat would incommode the House. He therefore hoped the amendment would be rejected, and the resolution pass as it came from the committee.

After a long debate the question to strike out was put and carried—85 to 75.

The question to insert Mr. BIBB's amendment was then put and carried—88 to 72.

WEDNESDAY, June 2.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting a letter from the Register of the Land Office at Kaskaskia, relative to certain claims to land in that district; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The remainder of the day was occupied in the reception and reference of petitions.

THURSDAY, June 3.

Another member, to wit: from North Carolina, BARTLETT YANCEY, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

FINANCES OF THE UNITED STATES.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from William JONES, acting Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his annual report on the state of the finances of the United States: which was read, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. The report is as follows:

In obedience to the act "supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to establish the Treasury Department,'" the Acting Secretary of the Treasury respectfully submits the following report:

The receipts into the Treasury from the first of October, 1812, to the 31st March, 1813, have amounted to - - - - - $15,412,416 25

The balance in the Treasury on the 30th of September, 1812, was - 2,362,652 69

Making together - - - - - 17,775,068 94

The expenditures from the first of October, 1812, to the 31st March, 1813, have amounted to - - - - - $15,919,334 41

Leaving a balance in the Treasury on the first of April, 1813, of - - - 1,855,734 53

17,775,068 94

The enclosed statement (A) shows in detail the several sources from which the receipts were derived, and the branches of expenditure to which the disbursements from the Treasury were applied.

Pursuant to the act of the 8th of February last, subscriptions for a loan of sixteen millions of dollars were opened on the 12th, and again on the 25th of March last. But, although a thirteen years' annuity of one per cent. was offered in addition to a six per cent. stock at par, for the money which might be subscribed, it being apparent from the result of the first subscription, that the whole amount could not be obtained on those terms, proposals in writing were invited. Offers, exceeding by about a million of dollars the amount wanted, were received, some demanding a thirteen years' annuity of one and a half per cent. in addition to six per cent. stock at par, but most of them requiring a six per cent. stock at the rate of eighty-eight per cent. On these terms, leaving to the subscribers the option, the loan was effected. In conformity with the public notification the same terms were extended to those persons who had subscribed on the first opening of the subscription, and they have the same option; which, if the stock, at the rate of eighty-eight per cent., be taken, is equivalent precisely to a premium of thirteen dollars and sixty-three cents and seven-elevenths of a cent for each hundred dollars loaned to Government. The enclosed papers under the letter B, are copies of the several public notices given on the subject, and a statement of the moneys respectively obtained by open subscriptions and written proposals, and showing also the sums obtained and payable in each place where subscriptions were opened.

Of that sum of sixteen millions of dollars thus obtained on loan, there was paid into the Treasury, prior to the first of April, 1813, the sum of $1,086,737 50, which makes a part of the moneys received previously to that day as stated in the statement (A.)

|--------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|-----------------|
| 1. The remainder of the loan above-mentioned - - - - - | $14,913,262 50 |
| 2. The sums payable on account of customs and of the sales of public lands, estimated at - - - - - | 9,320,000 00 |
| 3. The five millions of dollars in Treasury notes authorized by the act of February 25, 1813 - - - - - | 5,000,000 00 |
| Say - - - - - | 29,230,000 00 |

The expenses for the last nine months of the present year are calculated as follows:

|-----------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------------|--------------|
| 1. Civil list, and all expenses of a civil nature, both foreign and domestic - - - - - | $900,000 |
| 2. Payments on account of the principal and interest of the public debt, as per estimate (C) herewith - - - - - | 10,510,000 |
| 3. Expenses on account of the War and Navy Departments - - - - - | 17,820,000 |

Of the sum of $1,855,734 53, remaining in the Treasury on the 1st of April last, a small part may be considered as applicable to such extraordinary expenses already authorized, as may arise during the remainder of the year; and, for the same object, the sum of one million of dollars authorized by an act of the State of Pennsylvania, to be loaned to the United States, but which was not offered in time to be accepted as a part of the loan of sixteen millions, may be considered as a resource.

In this estimate the whole sum of five millions of dollars, authorized to be issued in Treasury notes, is taken as a part of the resources of the present year. But as it is not deemed eligible to increase the amount of Treasury notes in circulation, and as three millions only of those authorized by the act of 1812 were issued in that year, and are reimbursable in the course of the present year, it is respectfully suggested that in lieu of issuing two millions of the five millions authorized by the act of February, 1813, Congress should authorize an additional loan for the same amount, it being made a condition of such loan that its terms should not be higher than those of the loan of sixteen millions already effected.

The provision already considered is for the service of the present year only; that which will be necessary for the year 1814, requires an early attention. It is difficult to estimate with accuracy the sum which will be received into the Treasury from the revenue as now established. During a state of war, the customs, at the present rate of duties, have been heretofore estimated to produce five millions of dollars. The additional tonnage duty imposed upon foreign vessels by the act of the 1st of July, 1812, producing about two hundred thousand dollars a year, is not included in that sum. It is believed that, during the year 1814, a greater sum than five millions two hundred thousand dollars ought not to be relied upon as receivable into the Treasury from custom-house duties. The sum arising from sales of public lands may be estimated at six hundred thousand dollars, making, together, five million eight hundred thousand dollars. The interest alone on the public funded debt, on temporary loans, and on the Treasury notes, which will become payable in that year, will amount to four millions four hundred thousand dollars. The other engagements, on account of the principal of the funded debt, of temporary loans, and of Treasury notes, which will become reimbursable in that year, amount to seven million one hundred and fifty thousand dollars, exceeding, together, by more than five million seven hundred thousand dollars, the estimated amount of the receipts into the Treasury derived from the revenue as now established.

This view of the subject is sufficient to evince the necessity of a speedy and effectual provision for the service of that and the ensuing years. The mode and the extent to which this provision should be carried, have been heretofore suggested from this Department to Congress, and have received the consideration of that body. The expenses of the Peace Establishment of the United States, and the interest on the public debt, including that on the loans made for the prosecution of the war, are believed to be the least sum that ought, under any circumstances, to be raised within each year. These, if the expenses of the Peace Establishment are taken at the sum necessary for the ordinary expenditure of the United States previously to the additional armaments made in the year 1812, with a view to an approaching state of war, and including the interest on the loans of the years 1812 and 1813, and also of that which will probably be necessary in the year 1814, will amount, during that year, to eleven million four hundred thousand dollars, viz:

| The expense of the Peace Establishment, exclusive of the additional force authorized by the acts passed during the year 1812, may be estimated at the sum of | $7,000,000 |
| The interest on the public debt during the year 1814, will be as follows: On old funded debt | 2,100,000 |
| On six per cent. stock of 1812, including temporary loans received in part of the loan of eleven millions, which will remain unpaid in 1814 | 500,000 |
| On six per cent. stock of 1813 | 1,090,000 |
| On Treasury notes which will be reimbursable in 1814, say on five millions, at five and two-fifths per cent. | 270,000 |
| | <hr/> 10,960,000 |
| On the loan for the year 1814, interest payable within that year | 440,000 |
| | <hr/> $11,400,000 |

The revenue now established being estimated to produce $5,800,000, would leave to be raised the sum of $5,600,000, to cover the above sum of $11,400,000. The internal taxes heretofore proposed were estimated to produce

And the duty of twenty cents a bushel on salt imported, which though estimated heretofore at only $400,000 a year, during a state of war yet, as the consumption considerably exceeds two millions of bushels, may be estimated to produce

Making the sum wanted - - - $5,600,000

Although the taxes, if early laid, may be brought into operation in the commencement of the year 1814, yet, as they cannot be expected to have their full effect during that year, some auxiliary resource will be required. This may be found in the sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars, which is the excess of the Sinking Fund for the present year, over the demands on that fund, according to the existing engagements of the United States. This sum of one million five hundred thousand dollars may be carried to the Sinking Fund for the year 1814, and will be wanted in addition to the annual appropriation of eight millions of dollars, to meet the engagements on account of the public debt, which must be fulfilled during that year.

As reliance must be had upon a loan for the war expenses of the year 1814, the laying of the internal taxes may be considered, with a view to that object, as essentially necessary. In the first place, to facilitate the obtaining of the loan; and, secondly, for procuring it on favorable terms. It is ascertained that the terms of the loan for the present year would have been more favorable if the taxes had been previously laid; and it is obvious enough, that, by affording a security for the regular payment of the interest and the eventual reimbursement of the principal, more stable, and less liable to be weakened or cut off by the natural effects of war upon external commerce than a revenue depending, as that of the United States now does, almost wholly upon such external commerce, capitalists will advance with the greater readiness, and at a lower rate of interest, the funds necessary for the prosecution of the war.

Public confidence will be insured, and the means afforded of preserving the public credit unimpaired; a measure of the utmost importance in a country like ours, where, from the lighness of the demands made upon the people during the continuance of peace, the extraordinary expenses of a state of war can be supplied only by a resort to that credit.

The resources of the country are ample, and if the means now proposed, and those heretofore recommended from this Department, are adopted, it is believed they may be fairly and fully brought in action.

All which is respectfully submitted.

W. JONES,

Acting Secretary of the Treasury.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, June 2, 1813.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FISK, from the Committee of Elections, made a report on the petition of Burwell Bassett, contesting the election of THOMAS M. BAYLY.

The report is as follows:

That at the last general election in Virginia for Representatives to Congress, the said Burwell Bassett and the said Thomas M. Bayly were opposing candidates, in the district composed of the counties of Middlesex, Matthews, Gloucester, Warwick, Accomac, Northampton, James City, Elizabeth City, and the city of Williamsburg. From the poll of the several counties, the sitting member appears to have had a majority of fifty-seven votes in the said district, and he was accordingly returned as elected.

The laws of Virginia prescribing the mode of conducting such elections, direct that the sheriff, or other officer conducting the poll, shall close it the same day, unless the electors be prevented from attending by rain or the rise of watercourses, or unless there be more electors attending than can be polled in one day. It appears that neither rain, nor the rise of the watercourses, prevented the electors from attending on the election in the county of Accomac. Yet the poll in this county was continued three days; for what cause does not appear. It is contended by the petitioner that there is no evidence that this continuance was for a cause warranted by law, and, therefore, that it ought to be presumed illegal, the election void, and a new one ordered.

It is urged on the other hand, by the sitting member, that, until disproved, the officer's return, who conducted the election, ought to be respected as prima facie evidence of the legality of the proceedings, and the committee are unanimously of this opinion.

That, of the polls taken for the county of Accomac, Burwell Bassett had 61 votes, and Thomas M. Bayly 735 votes; 109 of the latter are challenged as illegal by the petitioner, who presented a list of their names, the greater number of which, on examination, are not found on the land list. The fact of these being polled for the sitting member, rests entirely on the declaration of the petitioner, who alleges that their names are on the list of the polls taken for the sitting member, a certified copy of which he was unable to procure from the proper office, but which list the sitting member declares to be incorrect.

It is alleged by both the sitting member and the petitioner, that at, and subsequent to the time of the election, the usual intercourse between the different parts of the district was so interrupted by the enemies' cruisers, as to put it out of their power to procure the necessary papers and evidence to support their respective allegations, and the sitting member asks for reasonable time to be allowed him by the committee to take testimony, under the conviction that he would be able, by the evidence to be taken, to support his poll. And upon a view of all the circumstances of the case, the committee are unanimously of opinion that further time ought to be granted the parties to procure testimony, and they accordingly submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That — weeks be allowed to the parties to procure testimony relative to the said election, and that the Committee of Elections have power to examine witnesses, and make order for such examination in this case.

The blank having been filled with the word five, the report was agreed to.

THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON, called up the resolution which he submitted for consideration a day or two ago, in the following words:

Resolved, That the following be added to the standing rules and orders of the House: An additional standing committee shall be appointed, at the commencement of each session, viz: a Committee on the Judiciary, to consist of seven members. It shall be the duty of the said Committee to take into consideration all such petitions and matters or things touching Judicial proceedings, as shall be presented or may come in question and be referred to them by the House, and to report their opinion thereupon, together with such propositions relative thereto as to them shall seem expedient.

Mr. JACKSON said he had been induced to submit this resolution, from the consideration that our laws are in many instances defective, and it is of the utmost importance that they should be amended; and that this object could be best attained by the appointment of a standing committee, to whom should be referred all propositions for establishing new courts and regulating their powers. He recollected two cases, falling within his own observation, which had led him to contemplate some such provision; and it was not without some surprise that he found it had been passed over so long. As long ago as during the existence of the internal taxes, one of those cases occurred. It would be recollected, he said, that prosecutions might be commenced in State courts for the penalties attendant on infractions of those laws. In pursuance of this provision a prosecution had been commenced in Virginia in an inferior court; judgment was rendered against an individual, who it was manifest had not conformed to the provisions of the law. The case was carried to a higher court, however, and on the ground that the Constitution had vested the Judicial powers of the United States in the Supreme Court, and such other courts as Congress might establish, it was decided that it was not in the power of Congress to confer jurisdiction on the State court. The offenders of course escaped. Another case occurred in the course of the last year, in which a prosecution was instituted against a post rider, for having opened the public mail travelling from Ohio to Kentucky. The fact was notorious. The same question occurred again, and the same decision took place. The individual was permitted to escape without punishment. An amendment to our laws was unquestionably necessary in this respect. To consider such cases, and the various applications for altering the organization or location of courts, &c., he considered the appointment of a standing committee necessary. With this view, and also to render the decision of the House more uniform on these applications, as they would be if all referred to the same committee, he had thought proper to propose this amendment to the rules.

No opposition being made to the motion, it was adopted without a division.

STENOGRAPHERS.

Mr. NELSON offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That, for disseminating information among the good people of the United States, it is expedient to admit stenographers into the House of Representatives; and that the Speaker of this House do cause seats to be provided for such additional stenographers as may be admitted, according to the standing rules and orders of this House."

Mr. NELSON said, he introduced this resolution to gratify his own sense of right, to do justice to the minority, and to facilitate the means of giving publicity to the proceedings of the House. He hoped it would pass without opposition.

Mr. ALSTON recommended, that the resolution should be referred to a select committee, which should have the power of revising the rules of the House. He was on the committee which reported the existing rule. He was for placing all the stenographers in the gallery. He thought the convenience of the House demanded this, and he would not impose upon the Speaker the disagreeable task, either of sending them all to the gallery, or making invidious distinctions between them. He hoped the mover would take this course; otherwise he should be forced to vote against this resolution.

Mr. FARROW moved that the resolution be postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. NELSON said, that he could not accede to either proposition. One great object, he said, of introducing his resolution was, that he might not be considered as coinciding in the reasons heretofore given upon the petition of George Richards. He voted against that petition. But not for the reasons assigned by the majority on the floor, which he wholly disavowed. He said, he had made this motion from a sense of duty; the public ought not to be debarred from any source of information; the minority ought not to be deprived of a stenographer by any exercise of power on the part of the majority. The newspapers through the country, said Mr. N., are denouncing us for closing our doors against Federal stenographers, and for using our power to oppress and bear down the minority on this floor. Will you continue to exclude reporters, and thereby sanction and justify all these accusations? Mr. N. said, he hoped not. He trusted a sense of justice to the minority and the public would induce the majority to adopt the resolution. Mr. N. made a strong appeal to the equity and feelings of the majority, and concluded by declaring he had performed what he deemed a sacred duty; and was no further solicitous for the issue of his motion, than what was induced by a wish, that the majority should sustain a character for liberality, fairness, and justice, which he feared would be sacrificed by its rejection.

Mr. FARROW said, he agreed with Mr. NELSON in all his remarks, except that he wished to place all the reporters in the gallery. He persevered in his motion to postpone.

The question was then taken and lost.

Mr. FARROW then moved to amend, so as to place all the reporters in the gallery; but before he could reduce his amendment to writing—

Mr. ALSTON moved to refer the resolution to a committee of seven, with power to revise and report any alteration of the rules they might deem proper: Which motion was concurred in, 70 to 67.

Mr. ALSTON, Mr. GROSVENOR, Mr. FISK of New York, Mr. NELSON, Mr. GASTON, Mr. FARROW, and Mr. McKIM, were appointed the committee.

FRIDAY, June 4.

Two other members, to wit: from New York, SAMUEL M. HOPKINS; and from Delaware, HENRY M. RIDGELY; appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. PITKIN presented the petition of the Darby Fishing Company, praying a remission of certain forfeitures and penalties incurred for an unintentional violation of the non-importation law, by introducing within the waters of the United States a vessel loaded with produce of the British West Indies.

The petition having been read, Mr. P. moved to refer it to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Some objection was made by Mr. WRIGHT to the reference of this petition, because it was not proper to legislate on particular cases, and because he looked upon this as one of a questionable character; but the opposition was withdrawn on the representation of Mr. PITKIN of the circumstances of the case, and Mr. WRIGHT contented himself with expressing his hope that if any provision resulted from the consideration of that petition, it would be of a general and not a particular character.

The petition was referred.

COMPENSATION TO VOLUNTEERS, &c.

Mr. SHARP offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire what provision ought to be made for the compensation of the mounted riflemen who were called into service from the State of Kentucky in the year 1812, and that the committee be authorized to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. S. said it might be necessary, for the information of some gentlemen not acquainted with the fact, to state that the troops alluded to in this resolution were those called out last autumn from the State of Kentucky. At the time that Detroit was surrendered, and Chicago had fallen into the hands of the enemy, there were but two forts in the Western country which resisted their encroachments. These were Fort Wayne and Fort Harrison, defended by small garrisons, which were likely to fall into the hands of the enemy, being at too remote a distance to receive immediate succor at the hands of the General Government. It was then that the Governor of Kentucky was applied to for a force for their relief. The citizens of Kentucky, with their characteristic patriotism, immediately marched forth to their relief, and defended the frontier until a regular force could be organized and marched. The services they rendered on this occasion were prompt, voluntary and efficacious; and he hoped that there would be no hesitation in considering this subject and making the necessary provision for their compensation.

Mr. GRUNDY said it was far from his intention to oppose the object of the motion. But he would suggest one consideration, which might induce the gentleman to agree to give it a different direction. That many measures had been taken by the Governors of several States, as well as by officers of the Army, by which expenses had been incurred not authorized by law, was a fact well known, particularly to those who represented the Western country. It seemed to him that this and similar propositions ought to be referred to a committee who could act generally on the subject; and let all concerned know what might be expected to be done on this head. If particular cases were referred to particular committees, individual and local feelings, of which no man can or ought to divest himself, would perhaps influence them to decide contrarily, &c. He therefore moved that this subject be referred to the Military Committee.

Mr. SHARP consented that his motion should take that course.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH said that he considered all cases in which the force of the country had been called out for its defence as standing on the same ground; and was of opinion that all the expenses of the militia and other forces, called out by the State authorities for the defence of the soil, ought to be defrayed by the General Government. He therefore hoped the gentleman would so modify his motion as to make the inquiry general.

Mr. SHARP having declined to connect his motion with any other question, with the merits of which he was not acquainted—

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH moved to amend the motion by adding, after the words "eighteen hundred and twelve," the following: "And also for defraying the expenses of the militia called out under the State authorities for the defence of the country against the incursions of the enemy."

Mr. McKEE pointed out what he conceived to be an obvious distinction between the two cases proposed to be blended in this motion. The object of his colleague's motion was to inquire into the propriety of compensating those who had marched, not to defend their particular State, not their native soil, but a distant and exposed frontier; whilst the amendment proposed to embrace those who had defended merely their own firesides. It was not imperatively the duty of Kentucky to send out her forces; but she was influenced by circumstances, and the impossibility of the Government acting with sufficient promptitude and efficacy. He was therefore opposed to joining things which were so distinct in their nature.

Mr. WRIGHT was in favor of the original motion; but he hoped the House would not feel inclined to consider also the claims of those who with equal zeal had defended the maritime frontier from an enemy of as perfect a savage character as those savages whom the Kentuckians had gone out against. He honored the patriotism of Kentucky; he honored her exertions; but it was proper also to consider the claims of other sections of the Union. The cases were made ex pari materia, and ought not to be separated; he hoped, therefore, they would all be referred to the Military Committee, and that no line would be drawn between the exertions of different parts of the country.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH hoped the inquiry would be general. He could not see the full force of the distinction drawn by the gentleman from Kentucky. He would ask, where was the difference of obligation to defray the expense of defending one part of the country or another? The same obligation had relation to all. For instance, he said, the militia of Delaware had been called forth to the defence of Lewistown; some few troops had been drawn from Pennsylvania for the like purpose. Were not the United States in this case as much bound to pay those called from Delaware as those from Pennsylvania? He did not say, as a positive proposition, that all the expenses of defence ought to be reimbursed by the General Government; but he did say, that in directing the attention of a committee to this subject, the rule should be general. He hoped no disposition would prevail to give to one State an opportunity of making larger drafts from the Treasury than another.

Mr. McKEE disclaimed any intention, in making a distinction, to excite unpleasant feelings; but there still appeared to him to be an obvious distinction between militia called out for the defence of their own firesides, and those marching for the defence of a distant territory. He had no objection to the proposed amendment, if in a separate proposition, but he still thought they ought to be kept distinct.

The amendment proposed by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH was agreed to by the House; and also another amendment, suggested by Mr. JENNINGS, to add the words "and the territorial" before the word "Governments."

The resolution, as amended, was then adopted, nem. con.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of

JUNE, 1813.

Tennessee Contested Election.

H. OF R.

William Kelly, contesting the election of THOMAS K. HARRIS, from Tennessee, made a report thereon; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

The report is as follows:

That at the last general election in Tennessee, for Representatives to Congress, the said William Kelly and Thomas K. Harris were candidates in the third Congressional district. From a return of the polls in the district, as made to the Governor of the State, it appears that the sitting member obtained one vote more than the petitioner, and, therefore, was returned as elected.

By the laws of the State, it is made the duty of the inspectors of the election for Representatives to Congress, to cause two fair statements to be made of the number of votes given at said election for each candidate, and certify the same; and it is also made the duty of the sheriff, or returning officer, to transmit one of the said returns, or certificates, to the Governor, and to file the other with the clerk of the county court of his county. That, on comparing the certificate with the polls taken in the county of Warren, in said district, and transmitted to the Governor, with the one filed with the clerk of said county, there appears to be two more votes for the sitting member, on the former, than there is on the latter certificate. And it further appears, by the first certificate, that the number of votes given to each candidate, being added together, will exceed by two the whole number of votes certified to have been given. The petitioner contends that these facts prove the certificate filed with the clerk correct, and the petitioner entitled to his seat.

The sitting member was not notified that his election would be contested, until after his arrival in this city, and he now states that he believes that, if time was allowed him, he could procure testimony to support his election, and to show that the petitioner received many illegal votes, and that there were several erroneous returns made in favor of the petitioner; and the sitting member asks for reasonable time to be allowed him to obtain such testimony.

Upon a full view of all the circumstances of the case, the committee are of opinion that further time ought to be granted to the sitting member to procure testimony, and they accordingly submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That until the — be allowed to Thomas K. Harris, a member of this House, to procure testimony relative to his election.

On motion of Mr. FISK, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the said report.

The petitioner was allowed to take his seat at the bar of the House to support his right.

Some conversation took place on the time which ought to be allowed.

Mr. KELLY (the petitioner) declared his resolution to oppose the granting to Mr. HARRIS of any time to procure evidence.

The blank was filled with three months; and the question stated on the adoption of the resolution as amended.

Mr. KELLY then opposed the report of the committee, on the ground that he was now entitled to the seat occupied by Mr. HARRIS, and ought not therefore longer to be kept from it. The burden of the proof, he contended, now rested not on him, but on the sitting member.*

Mr. HARRIS addressed the Chair as follows: I would feel no degree of pride, sir, in occupying a seat on this floor, were I not conscious that I

[* This is one of those questions frequently discussed on the floor of Congress, in which the people at large are but little interested, and which are, therefore, not particularly reported. We have, however, thought it but due to Messrs. Harris and Kelly to permit each of them to lay his case before his constituents at least, and for that purpose have procured for publication the statement of the argument of each gentleman, the one in support of his seat, the other in behalf of his claim. — Editors Nat. Int.]

Mr. Kelly's Statement,

Addressed to the people of the Third Congressional District, in the State of Tennessee:

Fellow-Citizens: Conceiving myself to be your legitimate Representative, elected by a majority of votes, in obedience to the dictates of duty I came on to this place, and, by my memorial to the House of Representatives, claimed the seat into which mere accident had thrown another man. The case was referred to the Committee of Elections, and their report committed to a Committee of the Whole House, where it was under discussion for three several days, and has ultimately in a vote of postponement for three months, in order that other testimony may be procured by the parties. I opposed, from first to last, with all the energy I was master of, the continuance of Mr. Harris in the seat of your Representative; and argued, in substance, that the proof I introduced was clear, competent, and legal, to prove the fact of having received a majority of votes; from which fact, my right to a seat necessarily resulted, according to the clearest and most obvious constitutional principles of the country; that the commission as a member must inevitably have issued to me and not to Mr. Harris, had no error been committed in making out the return from Warren court-house; that the error of an officer ought not to prejudice even an individual, much less the people of a district in their elective franchise; but should be corrected as soon as proven to exist, and the parties placed in the same situation they would have occupied, had no error been committed, and the man having a majority of votes should take his seat for the present in preference to the man having a minority, notwithstanding a commission had been accidentally issued to him; that, in fact, the vote of the people made the Representative, and not the commission, which was nothing more than a respectable grade of evidence pointed out by law, to prove the fact of a majority of votes having been given to the person commissioned; that it was good evidence of that fact until controverted by proof; but so soon as it was proven that a majority of votes were given to another candidate, the commission became defunct, its foundation sapped, and no office could be held in virtue of it; that, in fact, the parties should occupy the ground, and move in the orbits, designated for them by the people.

In the progress of the debate Mr. Harris neither manifested magnanimity and candor enough to admit, or nerve enough to deny, the existence of the error complained of; but enveloped himself in a labyrinth of nice technicalities, played off the adroit special pleader, and progressed protestando, "admitting for argument sake," that the error did exist; yet the evidence was entitled to it by the choice of the people of the district from which I come. And as I have taken it under a belief that I am their legitimate representative, I would be unwilling to relinquish it until I had a fair opportunity of procuring testimony to defend it.

The result of the election was not known to me until about the 28th or 29th of April, when I received a letter from Governor Blount, stating merely the aggregate number of votes that each candidate got in the district, and enclosing me the credential of my election. The Governor relied on to prove it ought not to be noticed; because, according to his notions of law, it was ex parte, he having no notice while in Tennessee, that the evidence would be taken or the seat claimed.

To this I replied, that, the copy from the clerk's office of Warren county court, and from the secretary's office, could not be denominated ex parte testimony, under any circumstances whatever; that any citizen was authorized to take copies of them at any time, without being bound even by the principles of decorum, much less of law, to give any man notice of his intention to take them; and as to the depositions introduced, unless Mr. Harris denied the facts proved by them, the exception to them on the ground of their being ex parte did not apply, because, a cross-examination (which was the object of notice) would not have altered the case, and therefore no injury had resulted to him for want of notice; the reason of the law did not exist, and, therefore, the law itself could not.

Mr. Harris, besides his ex parte argument, claims the benefit of a postponement, on the following grounds: 1st, because my poll had been overrated by the returns from Franklin and Bledsoe counties; 2dly, because very many illegal votes were given to me at the election; and, 3dly, because the sheriff of Rhea county had acted improperly, and destroyed votes given to him at the poll for Rodgers, and surreptitiously put in their room votes for me; all these things, he said, he could prove, as he believed, if time was allowed to procure testimony.

I contended, that he ought not to be kept in his seat, on either of these grounds, because his statement on every point was at war with the authenticated returns, which I produced, and conceived to be superior to the statement of any man; and if he chose to litigate those points, he ought to do it on the same terms he must have done it, had no error been committed in his favor from Warren; that, in fact, it was well proven to the committee, that he had a minority of votes, and therefore should be put to the laboring oar. But a large majority of the members were of opinion, that but one decision could properly be made in the case, and that decision should be postponed, until an opportunity would be allowed to procure testimony to every point in dispute; because it would be whimsical in the House, to turn out a man now, notwithstanding he had dropped among them by accident, and hereafter, on his making proof of his statements, to take him in again. This conclusion seems to me to be rather drawn from than to follow the premises: and the course of reasoning, as applied to the case in question, rather plausible than solid.

It is certainly true, that every tribunal should avoid acting whimsically, but, at the same time, it must be more important that they should avoid acting unjustly. The testimony offered proved the existence of an error, did not think it necessary, as I had a majority of the votes, to give me a full statement of the polls at every place of election. But for the satisfaction of Mr. Kelly, who he knew would wish to understand particularly how many votes were returned to me from each county, he transmitted to him a full statement of all the returns, requesting him to forward it, after he had examined it, to the editor of the Knoxville Gazette. This statement must have been received by Mr. Kelly nearly about the same time that I received the letter from the Governor, for, on the 3d of June, while on my way here, I saw Mr. Kelly at Sparta, and, of course, as to that particular point in the case, was sufficient to authorize its correction, which would have left the majority in my favor; and even if Mr. Harris were afterwards to contest my election successfully, it would only show by the reasoning adopted that the House had acted a little whimsically. It could not be said, they had acted unjustly, because they had legal evidence before them to justify the proceeding—evidence to show, that a majority of votes, were in fact given to me; but, on the contrary, suppose Mr. Harris should never be able to substantiate any of the statements he has made and have to descend from his accidental elevation, will not the people of the district, who have been deprived in the mean time of the services of their legitimate Representative, have been treated unjustly? To my mind they certainly will. One course, by possibility, might subject the House hereafter to the imputation of having acted whimsically; the other, with at least with equal probability, might subject them to the charge of having acted unjustly. Between these alternatives the choice is obvious: of two evils always to choose the least; to avoid Scylla we should not run foul of Charybdis. Again, it cannot be properly said that Mr. Harris holds his seat by virtue of his commission, because the proof that document once afforded of his having received a majority of votes is now done away. It is proven by legal and competent testimony that he did not get a majority; therefore he must hold by some other tenure, and this tenure is the existence of facts, evidenced by his own statements only. This tenure by statement and allegation, is not sanctioned by the laws and Constitution of the country. If it were, some men would always be in office, and the people liable to be represented by a man they never elected.

However, I would not be understood, as attaching the smallest degree of censure to the members of the House. No sublimary tribunal is exempt from error; and I am confident the difference of opinion upon the subject is an honest one, and the vote of postponement the result of judgment candidly exercised; and being so, it becomes a duty to acquiesce, however hard it may operate; and this duty is not at all infringed by pointing out in a decorous manner any reasons that may exist calculated to show that another course would have been more proper.

I have used every exertion in my power to discharge the duties which devolved on me as your Representative, and have no doubt, but my endeavors to serve you will be duly appreciated, not only by those who honored me with their suffrage, but by a number who voted against me.

Accept the assurances of esteem, &c.

on his way (as I now understand) to Warren county, to see whether the mistake did exist in the return from that county, which he now alleges to have been made. Mr. Kelly must, therefore, at that time have had, either on paper or in his recollection, a full statement of the returns which had been forwarded to him by the Governor. Why did not Mr. Kelly show it to me? Why did he not suggest to me the probability of a mistake from Warren? He says, sir, that delicacy prevented him from making the communication. This apology would well have been acceptable, if delicacy had also prevented him from controverting my election until he had given me fair warning of his intention to do so. What would have been the consequence if Mr. Kelly had shown me the statement of the returns which he had received? I would have seen immediately that the return from Franklin county gave him 227 votes instead of 223, the number which the sheriff of that county wrote him, a day or two after the election, that he got there. I would have seen that the return from Bledsoe county gave him 59 votes instead of 56, the number which several persons from that county, immediately after the election, said he had gotten there. I would have gone with the gentleman to Warren—I would have sent to Franklin and to Bledsoe, and would have seen, after rectifying all mistakes, who was fairly elected. But, sir, Mr. Kelly thought it most prudent to keep the statement of the returns from my view—delicacy prevented him from saying to me that he suspected a mistake had been made in the return from Warren of two votes in my favor, which, if rectified, would give him a majority of one. This kind of delicacy, sir, was doing me injustice, because, if he had given me the information, I would have examined into all the returns, and would have been prepared perhaps at this time to show to this honorable body that the mistakes before alluded to were made in Mr. Kelly's favor, which, if rectified, would give me a majority of at least six votes. What effect, sir, is this course of proceeding to have upon this affair? Will it be right for the gentleman to take advantage of his own omission to give me notice, when he had it in his power to do so, and that I should now be precipitated from the seat which I occupy, without having any chance to show by testimony that I ought to retain it? I would presume, sir, that the House of Representatives of the United States would never be prepared to make such a decision. I cannot avoid more particularly noticing the apology of the gentleman for not apprizing me of the supposed mistake, when I recollect that on Friday last he stated to this committee, that the reasons which induced him to suspect a mistake had been made in the return from Warren, was, that he passed by Warren court-house the day after the election, and that the sheriff had given him the number of votes I got there, which was 224 only. This shows that when he saw me he must have been convinced there was a mistake, and therefore, delicacy should not have prevented him from making it known to me. I never saw a statement of the returns from the different counties until I got to Knoxville and was shown it by the editor of the Knoxville Gazette, to whom Mr. Kelly had sent it.

Mr. Kelly said on Friday last, that "there were some men whose resources would be amply sufficient to enable them to travel so great a distance backwards and forwards, in the prosecution of such a contest, while the resources of others would be too limited for such a task." What idea these remarks were intended to communicate, I will not distinctly undertake to say; but I presume, sir, the affluent or indigent circumstances of parties will never be said to have any influence on this honorable body, in making a decision on a subject involving the legitimacy of a Representative of the people to the National Legislature. Mr. Kelly says, that if the mistake in the return from Warren had not been made, he would have obtained the commission of the Governor, and now would have been occupying my seat; and that he should now be placed in the same situation he would have been in if the mistake had not been made. This I know, sir, is the most plausible argument that could be urged in his favor, and upon the first consideration of it, it is admirably calculated to produce doubt upon the subject. But, upon a closer examination, it will be found to have nothing like reason for its support. Suppose Mr. Kelly on this occasion, instead of attempting to prove a mistake in the sheriff's return, had brought along with him credible witnesses, and had proved before the Committee of Elections, by them, that two or more persons that voted for me were, by the laws of Tennessee, not entitled to vote. And, suppose in that case he had contended that if I had not gotten those two or more illegal votes, he would have obtained the commission of the Governor, and would at this time have occupied my seat. Will it be said in a case like that—without my having had any notice of an intention on his part to contest my election before my arrival here, it would be right for me to surrender my seat, and return home to procure testimony to show that he received illegal votes also? No, sir, it might justly be said in a case like that, on my part, that if I had received notice that my election was to be contested, I might have been prepared to show that he got more illegal votes than I did. So also in this case, if I had received reasonable notice, I might have been prepared to show that more mistakes were made in his favor than in mine. The principle is the same. I had no notice, until my arrival in this city, that my election would be contested.

It is a fact, sir, which Mr. Kelly (to use his own language) will not hazard the contradiction of, that the sheriff of Franklin county did write to him a day or two after the election, stating that the number of votes which he got in that county was 223; the friends of Mr. Kelly told me they saw the sheriff's statement to him, and I received a letter by the last mail from a gentleman in Warren county, of high respectability, well known to all my colleagues from West Tennessee, confirming it to be a fact.

Independent of these reasons, I allege, that if I had time to procure testimony, I am informed and believe that I could prove the deputy sheriff of Rhea county, who held the election, was guilty of destroying tickets which had been given in by voters for Mr. Rodgers, and of putting other tickets in for Mr. Kelly in their place—and that upon counting out the tickets, their number wanted one of being equal to the number of votes. I received by the last mail a statement of these facts from Mr. Rodgers, a gentleman who was also a candidate, and who is well known to all my colleagues as a man of character and veracity. This, sir, is the only species of testimony that it could be expected for me to produce at this time in favor of a continuance of this contest.

What, sir, would be the consequence if it should be the opinion of the committee that they would decide finally upon it now, without giving me time to procure testimony? Mr. Kelly would be permitted to take my seat, and I would have to return home in search of evidence to show he was not entitled to it. Perhaps before the close of the session I might return here with evidence to show that a mistake had been made in favor of Mr. Kelly in one other return, which, if rectified, would give me a majority, whereupon I would be reinstated in my seat. Mr. Kelly might then go in search of other mistakes, or of illegal votes, and thus there would be no end to the contest.

But, sir, if we waive every consideration with respect to the want of notice, and decide from the legal testimony before us, it will still be found that the majority of votes would be in my favor. The law of Tennessee upon the subject requires that the sheriff shall certify who are the inspectors of each election in his county, and that his certificate shall be attached to the return. Upon looking at the document produced from the Secretary's office, containing all the returns, it will be found that there appears to be no such return from Roane county as is required by law—as it has no certificate of the sheriff showing that the persons who have signed themselves as inspectors were such.

Considerable further debate took place; when the Committee rose without coming to any decision. And the House adjourned to Monday.

MILITIA PENSIONS.

Mr. McLEAN offered the following resolutions for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making some provision for the widows and orphans of the militia slain by the enemy, or who may hereafter be slain by them, during the present war, while in the actual service of the United States, and for whose families no provision exists by law; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire whether any provision ought to be made for the indemnification of those persons who had property taken into the service of the Northwestern Army under the command of General Hull, and which, in consequence of his surrender of the garrison at Detroit, fell into the hands of the enemy; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. McLEAN introduced these resolutions by observing that he had examined the existing provisions of the laws on the subject of the first resolution, and had not been able to find that they embraced the object therein contemplated. There was indeed, he said, a provision for volunteers for twelve months, but none for the families of those who volunteered for a shorter period. He trusted that on this subject there could exist no difference of opinion; but that the Government would make such provision for the representatives of the men who had fallen in service as might in some degree free them from the pressure of want. It appeared to him that the inquiry ought not to be made, whether or not an individual slain in battle had been regularly enlisted or had volunteered for twelve months. The only question ought to be—was he, when he fell, fighting under the eagles of his nation against the enemies of his country. No matter whether he came to his death in resisting the marauders of our coast, or the savage enemy; his family was entitled to relief. The latter part of the resolution, Mr. McLEAN said, was intended to institute an inquiry into the propriety of making provision for those persons, whose property was taken into public service by the detachment under the command of General Hull, who had assisted that army in its progress to Detroit, and, in consequence of the surrender of that place, fell into the hands of the enemy. Although that property had been generally valued, yet, from the confusion which ensued on the surrender, many of those valuations had been lost. Mr. M. said he was informed that many applications had been made on this head to the Paymaster General, who could not pay the money, it appeared, without regular vouchers. Persons thus situated had a right to appeal to their country, and ask for remuneration; and he hoped he would not be refused.

The first proposition was agreed to.

Mr. SEYBERT suggested the propriety of making the inquiry proposed in the second resolution more general.

Mr. GROSVENOR moved to strike out the latter part of the resolution, and in lieu of it insert,

"those persons whose property has been captured or destroyed by the enemy during the present war." He did not propose a general provision for the relief of all who should come under this description; but there were an hundred cases, perhaps, to which relief ought to be extended, as well as to the sufferers at Detroit. The committee would, by having the whole subject before them, report generally, and save the House the trouble of distinct references.

Mr. FINDLEY said that in all the Revolutionary war, no provision had been made to compensate persons for property destroyed by the enemy. A distinction had always been taken in favor of property destroyed in the public service. The principle proposed in the amendment, which would include every vessel captured at sea, was not lightly to be gone into. He wished the resolution to lie for further consideration. He was of opinion some further legal provision was necessary, but how far he was not prepared to say.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

NATURALIZATION LAW.

On motion of Mr. FRISK, of New York, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the following bill:

A bill supplementary to the acts heretofore passed on the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization.

Be it enacted, &c., That all alien enemies resident in the United States or the Territories thereof, on the eighteenth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and twelve, may be admitted citizens of the United States, at the times, and in the manner prescribed by the laws heretofore passed on that subject, anything in any former law to the contrary notwithstanding: Provided, That no alien enemies shall be admitted citizens, who shall not, within nine months after the passage of this act, make such declaration of their intention as is required by law: And provided also, That nothing herein contained shall be taken or construed to interfere or prevent the "apprehension and removal, agreeably to law, of any alien enemy, at any time previous to the actual naturalization of such alien."

The bill was read through, and, no opposition being made to it, it was reported to the House.

Mr. BURWELL stated that he was not perfectly prepared at present to act on this bill, and was desirous to offer amendments; one of which he wished to propose for the purpose, if acceptable to the House, of confining the privilege of naturalized citizens to residents within the United States. He therefore moved that the bill lie on the table for the present.

After a few words from Mr. BENSON, who appeared to think that such a provision, if necessary, need not be incorporated in this bill; the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

THURSDAY, June 10.

Mr. HEMPSTEAD appeared, was qualified, and took his seat as the Delegate from the Missouri Territory.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to incorporate a company for making a turnpike road in the county of Alexandria; which bill having been gone through, was reported to the House, and, on motion of Mr. EPPES, ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of Thomas Sloo," in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BURWELL, from the Committee of Elections, made a detailed report on the petition of John Taliaferro, contesting the election of John Hungerford, a sitting member from Virginia, which concludes with the following resolutions:

"Resolved, That the said election held in April last was illegal and ought to be set aside.

"Resolved, That John P. Hungerford is not entitled to a seat in this House."

The report was referred to the Committee of the Whole.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made the following report:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the establishment of a well digested system of internal revenue, have had the same under consideration. They deem it unnecessary to say anything as to the necessity of providing additional revenue at a time when the general rate of expenditure has been so much increased by measures necessarily connected with a state of war. A reference to the reports from the Treasury Department and from the Committee of Ways and Means, during the last and preceding years, will show that a provision for additional revenue can no longer be delayed without a violation of all those principles held sacred in every country where the value and importance of national credit have been justly estimated. They have reviewed the system heretofore presented, and taking into consideration its having been sanctioned in its principles by a vote of the House of Representatives, have determined to recommend its adoption, with some modification, in preference to commencing a new system at a period when neither the principles or details could receive that mature consideration on which alone they could venture to recommend its adoption. The bills heretofore reported were founded on estimates which assumed for a basis the providing a revenue sufficient to meet the expenses of the Peace Establishment, the interest on the old debt, and on such new loans as have been or may hereafter be authorized. These several items for the year 1814, are estimated as follows:

| The expenses of the Peace Establishment - | $7,000,000 |
| The interest on the public debt— | |
| On the old funded - | 2,100,000 |

| On six per cent. stock of 1813 - | 1,090,000 |
| On Treasury Notes, which will be reimbursable in 1814, say on $5,900,000 at 5 2-5 per cent. - | 270,000 |

The committee therefore ask leave to report the following bills:

1. A bill for the assessment and collection of direct taxes.
2. A bill to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States.
3. A bill laying a duty on imported salt.
4. A bill establishing the office of Commissioner of the Revenue.
5. A bill laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise.
6. A bill laying duties on carriages for the conveyance of persons.
7. A bill laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors.
8. A bill laying duties on sales at auction of foreign merchandise and of ships and vessels.
9. A bill laying duties on sugars refined within the United States.
10. A bill laying duties on bank notes and on notes of hand, and foreign bills of exchange of certain descriptions.
11. A bill making further provision for the collection of internal duties.
12. A bill laying an additional duty on foreign tonnage.

The several bills above recited were read twice, and referred to a Committee of the Whole, and made the order of the day for Monday.

FRENCH DECREES.

Mr. WEBSTER rose, as he said, to call the attention of the House to a subject of considerable importance—a task which he had hoped would have fallen into the hands of some other gentleman better qualified than himself to undertake it. He then read the resolutions which will be found below. In offering these resolutions, it was not his intention, he said, to enter into any discussion or argument, or to advance any proposition whatever, on which gentlemen could adopt different views or take different sides. He would merely remark, by way of explanation, what would be remembered by all, that the subjects to which these resolutions referred, were intimately connected with the cause of the present war. The revocation of the Orders in Council of Great Britain was the main point on which the war turned, and it had been demanded for the reason that the French decrees had ceased to exist. This then was the point at issue. Mr. W. remarked on what he termed the contradictory evidence on this head: the letter of Mr. Champagny on one hand asserting the revocation; the speech of the Emperor to the free cities on the other denying it; the decisions of the French Admiralty Courts on one hand, and opposite decisions of the same courts on the other. The whole matter, in short, was involved in doubt. But, on the declaration of war, and not until then, a decree appeared repealing the French decrees; a decree, which, if issued, had laid dormant, mere brutum fulmen, until after the war commenced, and then only made its appearance. In March last, it would also be recollected, the President had communicated to Congress, immediately before its adjournment, certain correspondence between our Government and its Minister in France, the prominent feature of which correspondence was, that, in an interview between our Minister and the French Secretary for Foreign Affairs, which took place about the 1st of May, 1812, it was stated by the latter that the decree in question had been put into the hands of our Minister in France, and transmitted to the French Minister in the United States, at the time at which it bore date. To shed light on this transaction, Mr. W. said, it was, that he moved these resolves, in the discharge of what he deemed a duty to his constituents and his country. The declaration of the French Minister had a great bearing on the reputation of the country—on the reputation of those persons who, in their official characters, represented the dignity of the nation. To place their conduct in its proper light, he presented to the consideration of the House the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, unless the public interest should in his opinion forbid such communication, when, by whom, and in what manner, the first intelligence was given to this Government of the decree of the Government of France, bearing date on the 28th April, 1811, and purporting to be a definitive repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether Mr. Russell, the Chargé d'Affaires of the United States at the Court of France, has ever admitted or denied to this Government the correctness of the declaration of the Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow, the late Minister of the United States at that Court, as stated in Mr. Barlow's letter of the 12th May, 1812, to the Secretary of State, "that the said decree of April 28, 1811, has been communicated to his (Mr. Barlow's) predecessor there;" and to lay before this House any correspondence with Mr. Russell, relative to that subject, which it may not be improper to communicate; and also any correspondence between Mr. Barlow and Mr. Russell, on that subject, which may be in possession of the Department of State.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House whether the Minister of France, near the United States, ever informed this Government of the existence of the said decree of the 28th April, 1811, and to lay before the House any correspondence that may have taken place with the said Minister relative thereto, which the President may not think improper to be communicated.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House any other information which may be in his possession, and which he may not deem it injurious to the public interest to disclose, relative to the said decree of the 28th April, 1811, and tending to show at what time, by whom, and in what manner, the said decree was first made known to this Government, or to any of its representatives or agents.

Resolved, That the President be requested, in case the fact be that the first information of the existence of said decree of the 28th April, 1811, ever received by this Government, or any of its ministers or agents, was that communicated in May, 1812, by the Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow, and by him to his Government, as mentioned in his letter to the Secretary of State, of May 12, 1812, and the accompanying papers, to inform this House whether the Government of the United States has ever required from that of France any explanation of the reasons of that decree being concealed from this Government and its Ministers for so long a time after its date; and if such explanation has been asked by this Government, and has been omitted to be given by that of France, whether this Government has made any remonstrance, or expressed any dissatisfaction to the Government of France, at such concealment.

Mr. GROSVENOR having required the yeas and nays on the question of proceeding now to consider the resolutions, they were found to be—for consideration 132, against it 28, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Beall, Benson, Bibb, Bigelow, Boyd, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Brown, Burwell, Caperton, Champion, Chapell, Cheves, Cilley, Comstock, Conard, Condict, Cooper, Cox, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Pennsylvania, Dewey, Duvall, Earle, Ely, Eppes, Farrow, Forney, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Geddes, Gholson, Gloninger, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Grosvenor, Grundy, Hale, Hanson, Harris, Hawes, Hopkins of New York, Howell, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Hyneman, Ingersoll, Irwin, Jackson of Rhode Island, Jackson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of N. York, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, Law, Lewis, Lovett, Lyle, McCoy, McKee, McLean, Miller, Moseley, Murfree, Murkell, Newton, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Piper, Pitkin, Pleasants, Post, Potter, John Reed, William Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ridgely, Ringgold, Robertson, Ruggles, Schureman, Seybert, Sharp, Sheffey, Sherwood, Shepherd, Skinner, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Stockton, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Thompson, Troup, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Webster, Wheaton, White, Whitehill, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, Wood, Wright, and Yancey.

NAYS—Messrs. Bard, Bowen, Butler, Caldwell, Clark, Clopton, Crawford, Dawson, Denoyelles, Desha, Findley, Glasgow, Gourdin, Hall, Ingham, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lefferts, Montgomery, Nelson, Ormsby, Parker, Roane, Roberts, Sage, Sevier, Smith of Pennsylvania, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

The resolutions having been again read,

Mr. BIBB said he was persuaded that, on every proper occasion, the most perfect disposition would be manifested by the House to ask for any information solicited by one of its members. It was unquestionably their right, and under certain circumstances their duty, to ask for information of the Executive in relation to public affairs, but under other circumstances it might be improper. We are therefore, said Mr. B., in exercising this right, to judge of the effect any call is likely to produce on the public service. If it will not be prejudicial, the call ought to be indulged; but, if it might do injury, it would unquestionably be proper to refuse the call. For myself, said Mr. B., I am unable to determine at present, from the great extent of the resolutions, whether it would be proper to make the call or not. No injury, certainly, could result from a day's delay. Mr. B. therefore moved that the resolutions lie on the table, and be ordered to be printed.

Mr. WEBSTER said he had not the least objection to this course. He was willing to give the gentleman every opportunity to examine the resolutions, under the perfect conviction that he would find that nothing was demanded which could in any way be prejudicial to the public service.

The resolutions were ordered to lie on the table accordingly.

FRIDAY, June 11.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to provide for the government of persons in certain fisheries," also, a bill "to provide for the accommodation of the household of the President of the United States;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

The first mentioned bill was read twice, and committed to the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business.

The second mentioned bill was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the petition of the President and Directors of the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria, praying an extension of their charter, made a report "that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted."—Report concurred in.

Mr. DAWSON also reported a bill to authorize the sale of the Glebe, in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia, and to provide for the adjustment of the adverse claims to the same.—Twice read, and committed.

On motion of Mr. EPPES, the Committee of Ways and Means were discharged from the further consideration of the memorial for the establishment of a new bank in this District, to discount at a rate of interest less than six per cent. And it was committed to the District Committee.

Mr. ALSTON, from the committee to whom the subject had been referred, reported, in part, the following resolution for the adoption of the House :

"Resolved, That a sum not exceeding two hundred dollars be, and is hereby appropriated, out of the contingent fund of this House, for the purpose of making provision for the accommodation of stenographers in the galleries of the House, and that, whenever such provision shall have been made, no stenographers shall be admitted on the floor of the House."

The latter clause of this resolution was opposed by Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. MACON as being both unnecessary and inexpedient. Mr. MACON moved to amend the resolution by striking out the words in italic; but the motion was negatived, and the report was adopted, as above.

A bill from the Senate for the government of persons employed in certain fisheries, was twice read and referred to the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business.

A bill from the Senate to provide for the accommodation of the household of the President of the United States was twice read, and committed.

A motion was made, by Mr. DAWSON, to reconsider the vote, this day passed sub silentio, declaring it to be inexpedient to extend the charter of the Farmers' Bank of Alexandria.

Mr. GHOLSON observed that he knew nothing of the merits of this application; but, a single fact which had come to his knowledge was sufficient to influence his mind to give the application a fair and considerate hearing. That fact was, that this little bank, with a capital of only $300,000, had promptly come forward and loaned to the General Government $200,000.

The vote was reconsidered, and the report of the committee against the application was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill to incorporate a company to make a turnpike road in the county of Washington, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, as was also a bill to incorporate a company for making a turnpike road in the county of Alexandria, which had passed through a Committee of the Whole yesterday.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on bills to incorporate two or three insurance companies in this District; which were gone through, and reported to the House.

On motion of Mr. ROBERTS, these bills were ordered to lie on the table for examination, as he conceived their provisions to be too indefinite and unrestricted, &c.

On motion of Mr. HEMPSTEAD, the Committee of Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing further time for the payment for public lands in the district of Arkansas, in the Territory of Missouri; with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

NATURALIZATION LAWS.

On motion of Mr. FISK, of New York, the House resumed the consideration of the naturalization laws.

Mr. BURWELL rose to say that he had waived for the present his intention of proposing amendments to this bill; but he wished to give notice that he should not, at this, but at the next session of Congress, propose a radical change of our naturalization laws. He thought it was the duty of Congress to repeal, in toto, the laws of naturalization, or amend them in such a manner as to dry up the sources of collision with foreign Powers which those laws, as they now stand, might afford. These provisions he should propose at the present session, if he thought they would now receive the mature investigation which they merit. He had considerable objections to the bill before the House, as it now stood; unless they were removed, he must vote against it. The principal objection was, that it would give to the numerous class of foreign merchants, who have been ordered from the seaports, the advantage of availing themselves of all the benefits of citizenship, and the protection and privilege they convey, by merely declaring an intention to become citizens. Whilst the Government has rendered it impossible for foreign seamen to become citizens of the United States, he felt great reluctance to extend the benefits of naturalization to those who should seek naturalization merely in the way of trade, to enable them to acquire wealth among us with the greater facility.

Mr. GASTON said that he, too, like the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BURWELL,) had many objections to the bill. But that would not prevent him from endeavoring to amend it. A proviso to the bill, denies the right of acquiring citizenship to every alien "who shall not, before a certain day, declare his intention," &c. The phraseology of the bill would, at least, admit of doubt whether a similar declaration was not required, after the passage of this bill, from those who have heretofore made such a declaration. To remove this ambiguity, he moved an amendment, to include, also, those "who have already made" the necessary declarations, &c.

The amendment was adopted.

Mr. SHIPHERD said it was a fact which came within his knowledge, that many persons had been naturalized since the date of the declaration of war, viz: the 18th of June last. It was right, he thought, that those persons should be secured in the privileges of citizenship, without the additional trouble of renewing their oath, &c. He, therefore, moved an amendment, the object of which was to declare all such naturalizations as valid as if made before that day.

This motion was negatived without debate. For the motion, 57; against it, 73.

Mr. MACON proposed an amendment, the object of which was to confine the privilege of naturalization to such persons as have already declared their intention to become citizens, and going to take away the indulgence proposed to be allowed to those who have not so declared.

Virginia Contested Election.

JUNE, 1813.

Mr. GROSVENOR, after expressing his wish that this bill should be amended by a competent committee, with reference to its bearing on the law of last session, and the policy of the measures then adopted, moved that the petition be referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Motion agreed to nemine contradicente.

SATURDAY, June 12.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to reward the officers and crew of the sloop of war Hornet; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. ARCHER moved to commit to the Committee of Claims, so much of the report of the Committee of Unfinished Business as relates to a bill concerning invalid pensioners. This annual bill, it would be recollected, passed this House at the last session, but, having been amended by the Senate, had not been returned to this House in time to be acted on before adjournment.

The motion was agreed to.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election of John P. Hungerford, which report is in the following words:

The Committee of Elections, to whom was referred the petition of John Taliaferro, complaining of the undue election of John P. Hungerford returned as one of the Representatives from Virginia in the present Congress, have had the same under consideration and report:

That, at the last Congressional election in that State for Representatives, the said John P. Hungerford was returned as elected from the district composed of the counties of Westmoreland, Richmond, Lancaster, Northumberland, King George, and Stafford. The petitioner was also a candidate. The laws of Virginia prescribing the manner of conducting such elections direct that "the clerks of the polls shall enter in distinct columns, under the name of the person voted for, the name of each elector voting for such persons."

They further direct that "the clerks of the polls, having first signed the same, and made oath to the truth thereof, a certificate of which oath under the hand of a magistrate of the county shall be subjoined to each poll, shall deliver the same to the sheriff," &c.

Upon inspecting the polls of the several counties, the following facts appear:

In Westmoreland, the names of the voters are all entered in one general column, on the left hand margin of the book; and figures in numerical order, instead of the names of the voters, are inserted in the columns under the names of the candidates, as evidence for whom each vote is given.

In Richmond, the voters are registered in one column, and a straight mark, instead of the name of the voters, is inserted under the name of the candidate.

In Stafford, the Christian name of the voter is not written on the poll; the initial letter only is given. The same occurs partially in Lancaster.

On the polls of Westmoreland, Richmond, Lancaster, and Stafford, no certificate is found of any oath having been administered to the clerks keeping the same.

The petitioner contends, that the irregularities and deviation from the express provisions of the law, are of such a nature as to render void the election, and require a new one to be held. On the other hand it is urged by the sitting member, that most of the proceedings objected to, are justified by general practice, and that the manner of keeping the poll by entering the names of all the voters in one general column, is sanctioned by long usage; and that in Stafford, the initial only of the Christian name of the electors had been entered on the polls for several past elections.

The committee are sensible that trivial errors, committed by the officers conducting elections, resulting perhaps from a misconstruction of a doubtful passage of the law, ought not to deprive any class of citizens of the right of representation.

Still it must be manifest, that to preserve the elective franchise pure and unimpaired, the positive commands and requirements of the law, in respect to the time, place, and manner of holding elections, ought to be observed.

To enter the names of the voters promiscuously in one margin of the poll book, when the law positively directs them to be "entered in distinct columns," and "under the name of the candidate voted for," is as manifest a departure from the law, as the selection of another time or another place, than that mentioned in the law. Nor can the committee conceive, that the prefixing the initial only of the Christian name to that of the family or surname of the voter, is a fair compliance with the spirit and intent of the law, which declares "that the names of the voters shall be duly entered in distinct columns," &c. It is to be presumed, that the object of the law in having the name "duly entered," is to exhibit to the country, on a scrutiny, who are the persons voting, and to test their title to a vote, by comparing the poll with the land roll.

And when for example the initial letter is I, it must be obvious, that it may be taken to stand for John, or Joseph, or Jonathan, or Joshua, or Jeduthun, or Israel, Isaac, or Jacob, or Isaiah, or Jeremiah, and it would require no small share of perseverance and industry to contest an election when such endless uncertainty stands in the way of examination.

The committee have not been satisfied, that such irregularities have ever been sanctioned on a scrutiny, either by the Legislature of Virginia or of the United States. When opposing candidates have not objected to them, they may have passed sub silentio. We feel no hesitation in saying that custom ought not to justify a departure from the spirit and letter of positive law.

Upon a view of the whole ground, the committee, convinced of the importance of adhering strictly to the provisions of the law, as well as of the irregularities in conducting this election, respectfully submit the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the said election, held in the aforesaid district in April last, was illegal and ought to be set aside.

Resolved, That John P. Hungerford is not entitled to a seat in this House.

The House were occupied during the remainder of this day in the discussion of this report, and adjourned without coming to any decision thereon.

James Dufour, and his associates; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to provide for the widows and orphans of militia slain, and for militia disabled in the service of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Wednesday next.

On motion of Mr. HEMPSTEAD,

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing in force "An act authorizing the President of the United States to raise certain companies of rangers for the protection of the frontiers of the United States," passed January 2, 1812; and the act supplementary thereto, passed July 1, 1812; with leave to report, by bill or otherwise.

The engrossed bill authorizing the incorporation of a company for making a turnpike road in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia; and the engrossed bill to incorporate a company for making certain turnpike roads in the county of Alexandria, in same District; were read a third time and passed.

COMMITTEE OF ELECTIONS.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, after introductory remarks, explanatory of his views in respect thereto, offered for consideration the following resolutions:

1. Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire into the expediency of reviving an act, entitled "An act to prescribe the mode of taking evidence in cases of contested elections for members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to compel the attendance of witnesses;" or of reviving such parts thereof as they may judge expedient; with such alterations and additions as to them may appear necessary.

2. Resolved, That the rules and orders of this House be so far altered or amended, as that the Committee of Elections shall in future be designated by lot; for which purpose the names of all the members who shall take their seats on the first day of any session, on which the House may form a quorum, shall be put into a ballot box by the Clerk, in presence of the House, and seven of them shall be drawn therefrom by the Speaker, also in presence of the House; which seven members, thus drawn, shall constitute the Committee of Elections. But if, in any case of contested election, one or more of said committee be interested therein, or related to either of the parties, he or they shall, on motion to the House, be excused from sitting thereon, and one or more members shall be substituted in such case by lot, as aforesaid, from all the members who shall then be present, not on said committee, nor parties in said case.

3. Resolved, That a special committee be appointed to examine the decisions of this House, already made, on the subject of contested elections, and report the rules, points, and principles, which appear to them to have been thereby settled or adjudged, and the cases in which they may have been thus settled or adjudged.

The resolutions were read: when the first resolution was concurred in by the House; the second was ordered to lie on the table; and the third was postponed until Friday next.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then proceeded to the order of the day—the consideration of the report of the Committee of Elections on John Taliaferro's petition, contesting the election of John P. Hungerford—in Committee of the Whole.

The House sat till a late hour on this report, which underwent a full discussion; when the Committee rose, a motion was made to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of the report, and negatived.

TUESDAY, June 15.

Another member, to wit: from Ohio, WILLIAM CREIGHTON, jun., appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. EPPES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the bill from the Senate, "for the relief of Alexander Phoenix," with amendments; which were read, and concurred in by the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

DISTRIBUTION OF ARMS.

Mr. PITKIN rose to propose a motion. He said that in 1808, it was within the knowledge of all, that a bill had passed for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States, and an annual appropriation of $200,000 had been made for that object. Since that time a number of arms had been procured under the law, and a distribution in part had taken place. It appeared, by documents placed before the House at a former session, that there had been procured, in consequence of this appropriation, upwards of 31,000 stand of arms; and that about 16,000 stands had been distributed to several of the States and Territories, eleven in number. The House had no information of the distribution of the remainder, or that any distribution had taken place of those which had been since procured—for contracts had been announced to have been made, to a considerable extent, for further supplies. The construction given to the law appears to have been, that a distribution might be made to some States to the exclusion of others. This construction, Mr. P. apprehended, was a very different one from that contemplated by the Legislature which passed the law. The fair construction of the law, and according to his recollection the object of those who passed it, was, that the arms should be equally distributed as received by the United States. Mr. P. quoted the terms of the law, requiring the transmission of the arms procured under it to the several States and Territories, to be distributed by the local authority of each. The report made to the House on this subject, accounted for the inequality of distribution, by stating that the arms had been distributed to those parts of the Union most exposed. The situation of the United States had materially changed since that letter was written. Mr. P. said, his own opinion had been decidedly, that whenever a distribution took place it should be in equal proportions to each State, in proportion to its effective militia. But he would remark upon the principle stated in the War Department, that now, and at the time that letter was written, there were many States as much exposed as those to whom arms had been distributed. Arms had, for instance, been given to New Hampshire, and not to Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, Pennsylvania, or Virginia. As to the situation of New York, no one, he presumed, would imagine that she was not as much exposed as New Hampshire. Of seacoast New Hampshire had but a single point, and yet arms were given to her, whilst none were given to Connecticut, with a seacoast of a hundred and twenty miles, and a comparatively small territory, or to Massachusetts, with her numerous ports. Already had Connecticut three or more regiments called out to defend a squadron of the United States, which had sought shelter within her waters. With or without this evidence of her exposed situation, she was entitled to her fair proportion of the arms procured under the law in question. For the purpose of examining whether it was not the intention of the law that the arms should be equally distributed to each State, and to bring the subject generally before the House, he offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary to be made in the act for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States; and whether any, and, if any, what alterations are necessary, as to the time when the arms, procured by virtue of this act, shall be distributed in each State and Territory; and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. TROUP said that, no doubt, the gentleman from Connecticut, in offering this resolve, had been actuated by the most fair and patriotic motives: but he was well aware that they would be liable to misconstruction; that the motion would be liable to be considered as calculated to excite distrust and jealousy between the General and State governments. It was very true, as the gentleman had stated, that in 1808, the Legislature did make an appropriation towards a complete arming of the militia of the United States. It appeared in December, 1812, from official information to the House, that an amount of $400,000 had actually been expended under the law, and that 24,000 stands of arms had been placed in the hands of a part of the militia. This number of arms, to be distributed among the great body of the militia, bearing but a small proportion of the whole, it became a question, how these arms should be distributed. What was the fair standard presenting itself to the Government? To whom should these arms have been distributed? To those States, surely, in preference, which stood in the greatest need of arms: not to the States not threatened with invasion, not actually invaded; but to those which were threatened, to those which were actually invaded. The Government assuming to itself this rule, did distribute the arms among the States, confining the distribution principally to those States which were most jeopardized. In examining the apportionment of these arms, we shall find that nothing like political prejudice has operated, as the gentleman has seemed to insinuate. To three Federal States, 4,500 of the 16,000 stands distributed, were given. True, none were given to Massachusetts or Connecticut, two Federal States; but, let it be recollected, none were given to New York, always decidedly republican in the mass of its people; not a single stand was given to Pennsylvania, the centre, the sun (if you will) of democracy, who has always supported the present Administration by a majority of thirty thousand votes. Virginia, the Ancient Dominion, whose influence is said to be everywhere present, did not receive a single stand. He submitted to the gentleman and to the House whether, in this distribution, there had been anything like political partiality. Gentlemen in opposition, from the Eastern States, did themselves declare, when the law of 1808 was on its passage, that this principle was incorrect and radically wrong; because, under the present system of militia, having carried the law into execution, the militia of the Eastern States were completely armed. We well recollect that a gentleman from New York got up and stated, that their militia were not fully armed; but the gentlemen on the other side contradicted him, and declared that their militia were well armed. When this act was repeatedly stated on the floor of Congress, and was perfectly well known to all, what was the Executive to do in regard to the distribution of the few arms which had been procured? Unquestionably to distribute them in the first instance, not to those already armed, but to those who stood in need of them. This course it had pursued.

Mr. PIERCE said he was not a little surprised that the gentleman should have taken so wide a range in opposition to a resolution, the object of which was merely to inquire into the propriety of amending a law. He was very sorry also that the gentleman should have introduced a distinction between Federal and Democratic States. Sure he was, Mr. P. said, that he had said nothing which could lead to the observations which the gentleman had made on this head. The gentleman himself certainly would not pretend that a discrimination ought to be made between States according to their political complexion. Mr. P. said he had made no charge of partiality. He had stated that a construction had been given to the law different from that which the Legislature intended; and this fact, which is the very object of the inquiry, the gentleman seemed to admit. If the Secretary of War could designate the States to which he would now give arms, in preference and to the exclusion of the others who are equally entitled, he may do so for any length of time: and particular favorite States (if he might say so) might have the whole of their militia armed, whilst to others not a single musket would be given. This was never contemplated by those who passed the law. Each State paid its proportion of the revenue which was applied to the purchase of arms; and each State, whether well or ill-armed previously, ought to have its proportion of arms. Mr. P. quoted the report made at the last session, from which it appeared that 16,000 stands of arms only had been distributed under the law. Some had been loaned, to the amount of about 8,000 stands; but the Government was certainly not authorized to loan arms procured under a special appropriation for a different purpose. The loaning was in violation of the law. The object of this resolution was not to excite jealousies or draw invidious distinctions, but to inquire into the execution of a law. Mr. P. said the gentlemen might, in speaking of his motives, have spoken ironically; but he was mistaken if he had attributed to Mr. P. other motives than those which he had declared to have induced him to bring forward this motion. It was a fair subject of inquiry, and, he contended, a proper one. The militia of the Eastern States might be armed better than those of the South, and those arms had been procured at their own expense. But that was no reason why they should not claim the arms to which they were entitled. You might as well say that a rich man should not recover a debt because his neighbor wanted money more than himself. If the exposed situation of States, however, were the sole criterion, he had shown that some States which had received no arms were more exposed than others which had.

Distribution of Arms.

Mr. TROUP said the gentleman had mistaken the import of his observations. He had not contended that the operation of the law ought to be unequal, because every State would eventually reverse its proposition; nor had he opposed the motion, about the fate of which he felt little anxiety. The gentleman had in the outset endeavored to show, without using the word federal, that the two Federal States of Massachusetts and Connecticut had been unreasonably neglected; and, Mr. T. said, he had merely risen to show how groundless was the imputation of partiality in this respect, in which design he had succeeded, according to the gentleman's own acknowledgment.

Mr. PITKIN said he really had supposed the gentleman meant to oppose his motion. It was far from his intention to have introduced political distinctions of States into the House.

Mr. FISK, of New York, said, although he had himself no particular desire for the inquiry sought for, he was not disposed to refuse it to those who wished it. He thought, however, the subject had better be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs; and moved an amendment directing that committee to inquire, &c.

Mr. PITKIN objected to this amendment. The proposed inquiry regarded the construction of a law, and not anything relating to the present war. It had therefore no connexion with military affairs, and would be improperly referred to that committee.

Mr. FISK replied, that the amendment which he had proposed still appeared to him perfectly proper. The subject of inquiry was the distribution of arms; and if arms had no relation to military affairs, he did not know the use of them.

The amendment proposed by Mr. F. was adopted—yeas 82.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, said that the resolution, he was sorry to say, presented itself at a time and under circumstances, which, however disposed, would prevent him from voting for it, as it would in his view imply a censure on the Executive. A part of the arms had been assigned to the State in which he lived; but not to Massachusetts and Connecticut—and why? Because they were not exposed to danger, and needed not defence at that moment, as other States did. If we may believe the official communications of their Executive, those States were in the first place in no danger whatever of invasion; and, in the next place, if they were in danger, they were in such a high state of discipline and so well supplied with arms as to be perfectly competent at any moment to repulse an invading foe. The State of New Hampshire, however, took a different ground. Perhaps her militia were not so well armed; I know it was the case in Vermont, where the militia were very illy armed. Now I think, sir, that the Executive of the United States proceeded on perfectly just grounds in that moment of peril. The Government thought proper to distribute arms to those States which were in danger, and not to those whose Governors had officially informed it that they thought their respective States perfectly secure. Mr. F. then quoted the letter recently published from the Secretary of War to the Governor of Massachusetts; stating that Massachusetts would receive her due proportion of arms whenever the state of things would justify it. There was no fear therefore of her being deprived of her right. He thought it proper to say what little he had, because it appeared to him that the letters of the Governors of Massachusetts and Connecticut furnished a complete and ample reply to the complaint that they had not been furnished with arms.

Mr. PITKIN said, in reply to Mr. FISK, that this distribution of arms had been made previously and not subsequently to the declaration of war. Since that time the state of things had materially changed. And, with respect to Massachusetts and Connecticut, if they chose to defend themselves, ought they not, if on that account only, to have the arms to which they were entitled? Because they had done something which it seemed the gentleman did not like, they were not to have their arms. If, however, they were to defend themselves, at their own expense, the least that could be done was to give them the arms necessary for that purpose.

Mr. FISK said that the gentleman was mistaken in the fact of the distribution of the arms before the war. Some might have been distributed before it was actually declared, but with a view to that event. He had no where said, nor had anybody else, that Massachusetts and Connecticut were not ultimately to have their proportion of arms; but that the Executive had acted wisely in giving them first to those who wanted them more, when those States had declared themselves fully prepared.

Mr. BIBB said that for himself he could see no possible objection to the resolution. The object of it was not to inquire whether the President had or had not done his duty, but whether an act required amendment or not.

Mr. WRIGHT rose to ask the gentleman from Connecticut, whether, if he had been Secretary of War, and certain parts of the Union had been exposed, and the arms had been placed at his disposition, whether he would not first have supplied the exposed points? How could the Secretary of War have been true to his trust, and acted differently? Mr. W. was not friendly to the resolution, because he thought it went to implicate the Executive. Could it be that the State which the gentleman represented, or any other State, wished the arms so distributed as not to contribute to the general good? Mr. W. said he thought the arms had been distributed, as a patriot ought to have disposed of them, and so as to contribute to the best interests of the country.

Mr. WEBSTER said that the difficulty on this question appeared to him to arise from considering the act of 1808 as a war measure. It was a peace measure, passed in a time of peace, and not designed to place in the control of the Executive a great quantity of arms, to be disposed of at his discretion. The act did not relate particularly to a state of war. It was a part of the permanent establishment of the country. If, on inquiry, it should appear that no amendment to the law was necessary, the people concerned might be satisfied; he would not say that they would or ought to be satisfied with a refusal to inquire. The law expressly provides for a distribution of the arms among the several States and Territories, according to the numbers of their effective militia. Upon what ground, then, could arms be furnished to some States and refused to others? The act of 1808 did not indeed provide when or how often this distribution should take place, or there could be no hesitation in saying that the law had been positively violated. The inquiry in this case appeared reasonable and necessary, and ought to be granted, to ascertain and fix the construction of the law.

Mr. CALHOUN said he could not conceive that the Executive had acted wrongly in considering the object of the law to be the defence of the country. Even the Peace Establishment, upon which the gentleman last up has placed it, had for its ultimate object a state of war, and looks to such an event. The Executive therefore could not be considered blameable, if, regarding the ultimate object of the law, they had put arms into the hands of those most exposed to foreign assaults. Mr. C. was perfectly willing, however, that an inquiry should be made into the matter, and should vote for the resolution having that for its object.

The resolution as amended was then adopted with very few dissenting votes.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House again went into Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Elections, on Mr. HUNGERFORD's contested election.

The Committee rose and reported progress, after much debate; and the House refused them leave to sit again.

The House took up the report of the committee.

A motion was made by Mr. MACON, that the report be recommitted to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to inquire into and report the state of the poll in the several counties of the said Congressional district, and procure and report the law of the last Legislature of Virginia concerning elections to Congress.—Motion rejected.

The question was then taken on the concurrence with the Committee of Elections in their first resolution, viz: "That the election was illegal, and ought to be set aside"—and decided thus: For the report 78, against it 82, as follows:

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 16.

Mr. ALSTON, from the Committee of Revision and Unfinished Business, reported the bill from the Senate "for the government of persons engaged in certain fisheries," without amendment; and the bill was read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. INGERSOLL, a select committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to subscribe a number of shares to the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

A motion was made by Mr. FISK, of Vermont, to recommit the report of the Committee of Elections on Mr. HUNGERFORD's contested election, to the Committee of Elections, with a view to a scrutiny of the polls, the House having yesterday determined, by rejecting the report, that the election was not void by the illegality of the manner in which it was held.

Some conversation ensued on this motion, which was at length determined in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 73. So the report was re-committed.

The bill from the Senate for the relief of Alexander Phoenix (as amended by the addition of the case of William Nexsen, jr.) was read a third time, and passed.

Messrs. CONDUCT and ROBERTS opposed, and Messrs. BIBB and POST supported the bill. The bill was passed—ayes 80.

PETITION OF JOHN DILLON.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Dillon, of Maryland, made the following report:

That it appears to your committee, from the evidence adduced to them, that the schooner Rachel, of which the petitioner was the owner, was seized in the port of New Orleans for a supposed violation of a law of the United States, entitled "An act to suspend the commercial intercourse between the United States and certain ports of the Island of St. Domingo." By the judgment of the district court for the district of New Orleans, the said schooner was, on the 26th of February, 1808, condemned, and together with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, ordered to be sold. From this decision of the district court, an appeal was made to the Supreme Court of the United States. Before, however, a decision was had in the court of the last resort, the decree of the court below was carried into effect; the schooner was sold, and the proceeds thereof distributed under the aforesaid act of Congress, the one moiety to the collector and other officers; and the other moiety was, by the Collector of the port of New Orleans, transferred, in his account, to the credit of the United States. The moiety transferred to the credit of the Government amounted to the sum of three thousand five hundred dollars; and the day on which the said sum was entered to the credit of the United States, was the 30th of June, 1808. It further appears to your committee, that the Supreme Court never finally acted upon the petitioner's appeal until the year 1810, when, by its decree, the judgment of the court below was reversed, and a restitution of the property awarded. But, in consequence of the sale of the said schooner, and the distribution of the proceeds thereof, in conformity with the decree of the district court before the decision of the Supreme Court was had thereupon, the petitioner has been unable to receive any benefit whatever from the order of restitution awarded by the Supreme Court.

The committee are of opinion that the United States are responsible to the petitioner for the one moiety of the proceeds of the sale of said schooner, which was received by them, and that the amount thereof ought to be paid to the claimant; they, therefore, ask leave to report a bill for his relief.

Mr. ARCHER then presented a bill for the relief of John Dillon; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

DEFENCE OF MARITIME FRONTIER.

Mr. FISK, of New York, remarked, that an allusion had been made in a petition presented today to the state of defence in one of our cities. He now rose for the purpose of calling the attention of the House to the subject generally. On recurring to this subject, it could not be denied that much had been done for the defence of our seaports, and that many of them were in a respectable, if not a perfect state of defence. But more might, doubtless, be done. If one place appeared to him to be more exposed and less efficiently defended than another, it did not become him here to state it. It would be sufficient, for his present purpose, to state that three-fourths of our seacoast had been declared in a state of blockade; that our waters were infested, and coast lined with the armed boats and barges of the enemy, which were engaged in marauding and destroying the property of our citizens, with an impunity which was deeply to be regretted. He wished an investigation, for the purpose of inquiring whether any means could be devised to defend our coast from a warfare so distressing and vexatious. He needed not, he presumed, say anything more to induce the House to adopt the following resolutions:

Mr. F. then moved three resolutions, as follows:

1. Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of procuring and equipping such number of barges and row-galleys as may be required to aid in the defence and protection of our seacoast, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

2. Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of equipping, for the public service, the gunboats belonging to the United States, not now in actual service.

3. Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire if any, and what, further provisions are required by law, for the better defence of the towns and cities on the seacoast, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. NELSON said that he thought it proper to state, lest an imputation of indifference on this head should rest on the Naval Committee, that that committee had paid attention to these subjects, and had them now under consideration.

Mr. FISK disclaimed any intention to throw any censure on the Naval Committee; but the gentleman would properly appreciate the feelings of the people on the maritime frontier on this subject, which fully justified that particular attention of the House to their wishes, which Mr. F. had proposed.

The resolutions were adopted without opposition.

SEIZURE OF PRIVATE PROPERTY.

Mr. McLEAN then called for the consideration of the resolution which he had proposed on the subject of making compensation to those individuals, whose property, whilst in the public service, had been seized at Detroit.

The resolution having been read, together with the amendment thereto proposed by Mr. GROSVENOR, when it was last under consideration, going to extend the inquiry to all property destroyed by the enemy—

Mr. McLEAN said he could not agree to the amendment proposed to his motion, because it was unlimited in its extent, embracing as well captures on sea as on land. To remunerate our citizens for all the depredations of the enemy, might consume all the resources of the nation. Although it was the duty of every nation to provide for the safety of the persons and property of its citizens, it had never been considered under an obligation to indemnify those persons whose property was sacrificed by the enemy, unless that property was employed in the public service. If another rule was to prevail, individuals would feel but little anxiety for the safety of their property, and would engage in the most hazardous enterprises, knowing that they could not in any event suffer a loss. Neither was the Government bound to repair injuries sustained by the invasion of the enemy. Although devastation should mark his progress, this was one of the calamities incident to a state of war, for which the Government could never indemnify individuals. Such, however, were not the injuries specially alluded to in the resolution. The property therein referred to had been taken into the public service, and principally consisted in wagons and teams essentially necessary for the transportation of baggage, which continued in public employ until they passed into the hands of the enemy. It did not require much discrimination to mark the distinction between property thus captured, and that which is under the control of its individual owner, whose misfortune in losing it might arise from his own neglect or temerity. Such losses a Government was not liable, on the principles of moral justice, or by compact, to remunerate. It was admitted on all hands that private property must be subservient to public good. Whenever it is necessary, the agent of the Government may lay his hand on private property, and apply it to the public service; but inseparable from this is the right of compensation to the individual for the loss he thereby sustains. Such is the species of claim embraced by the resolution as it stands. Should the amendment be adopted, the resolution would embrace principles so broad as, should they be adopted by any nation, would sooner or later end in national bankruptcy. Mr. McL. said he had no objection to the extension of the inquiry to cases similarly circumstanced with that to which he proposed particularly to direct it; but to consent to the proposed amendment would be to abandon the claim he advocated—a claim founded on the principles of immutable justice.

Mr. GROSVENOR said that in such cases as this there were two ways of proceeding—by petition of individuals, or by general inquiry. This resolution went to inquire into a particular transaction, not upon the claim or motion of the petitioners, but upon that of a member of the House. If that course of proceeding be resorted to, the inquiry ought to be general and not particular. Laws ought not to be passed with a view to particular cases, where there existed many others of a like character. In this case no petitioner had come forward stating his grievances; but, on the motion of a gentleman who had heard of the case, an inquiry was to be entered into. In his apprehension, this was an improper mode of proceeding. Either it should be left to the petitioners, or a law should be passed embracing all the cases which could occur, and providing for their adjustment on general principles. One or the other of these courses would be proper. As to the argument of the gentleman on the propriety of admitting certain claims of a particular character, it had nothing to do with the resolution in its present form. The argument might well apply when the report should be received from the committee. A case occurring at Ogdensburgh came precisely under the same description as that of Detroit. Certain houses in that place had been let out to the Government for barracks; they had been burnt as public property by the enemy. And, if this committee should be constituted, many claims of a similar nature would present themselves. Why then select the case of Detroit alone?

Mr. McLEAN said if the gentleman from New York would adapt the language of his resolution to the explanation which he had given of his views, he should not object to it: that is, if he would so amend it as to embrace only property destroyed in the public service.

Mr. GROSVENOR declined varying his amendment. He would only remark on this head that there might be many cases of loss by invasion, in which the petitioners might have a claim on the public. At any rate, there could be no harm in a general inquiry, which would be open under his amendment to all cases.

Mr. McLEAN moved to amend the amendment so as to restrict it to cases of property captured in the service of the Government.

This amendment to Mr. G.'s amendment was then agreed to, and then Mr. G.'s motion also was agreed to.

The original motion as amended was then agreed to, in the following words:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire whether any provision ought to be made for the indemnification of those persons whose property has been captured or destroyed by the enemy while in the service of the public during the war, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise."

French Decrees.

H. OF R.

FRENCH DECREES.

The House proceeded to the consideration of several resolutions proposed by Mr. WEBSTER a day or two ago, the first of which was read in the following words:

"Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, unless the public interest should, in his opinion, forbid such communication, when, by whom, and in what manner the first intelligence was given to this Government of the decree of the Government of France, bearing date on the 28th of April, 1811, and purporting to be a definitive repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan."

Mr. CALHOUN said he did not rise to oppose the passage of this resolution on account of its object; but he objected to the novelty of the form of the resolution. The resolution went further than merely asking for information; it also asks, when and by whom the information in question was received. Such form and particularity was unprecedented in such cases. He rose to ask the precise object of the gentleman in giving this form to his motion. What use was intended to be made of the information called for?

Mr. WEBSTER said, with respect to the use to be made of the information to be obtained, it would depend on what that information should be. With respect to the form of the resolution, it had been offered in this form because it was on a subject on which he wished for particular information, of that nature which was designated by its terms.

Mr. RHEA said it appeared that the only object of the gentleman was, to know when the repeal had been notified. The existence of the repealing decree was not questioned. It was, therefore, immaterial when and how it was communicated; unless, by the inquiry something can be discovered in which the Government or the Executive has not done its duty. As no object could be answered by the agreement to this motion, he moved to postpone the further consideration thereof indefinitely.

On the question of agreeing to this motion, Mr. HANSON called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CALHOUN said he hoped the gentleman from Tennessee would not press this motion. If we advert to the transactions which have taken place since the declaration of war, we shall find that on many occasions this conversation has been made a handle of, and that a certain degree of suspicion has been attempted to be attached to the Chief Executive officer on this head. A resolution had been adopted at the end of the last session, which did not include the whole object of the present resolution; and Mr. C. for his part had no indisposition to afford to gentlemen an opportunity of obtaining all the information they could wish, if asked for in a proper manner. He hoped, therefore, the gentleman would withdraw his motion.

Mr. RHEA said, although he was not much in the habit of withdrawing motions which he had made, he would, for the present, withdraw his motion, with the intention, however, to renew it, if in the course of the discussion it should seem to him expedient.

Mr. CALHOUN said, he could not but think that the gentleman from New Hampshire had rather eluded than answered his inquiries. I asked, said Mr. C., the reason of the novelty of the form. The gentleman says his object is particular information. If information only be wanted, I am willing to join gentlemen in asking for every information they may wish. But I object to the novelty of the form; to the use of so particular terms. Mr. C. submitted to the good judgment of gentlemen the propriety of varying the language of the resolve.

Mr. GROSVENOR said, without entering into the merits of the resolve, he would state the impressions of his mind as to the form of it. The gentleman from South Carolina had admitted that suspicion had attached to this Government as to the decree in question. [Mr. CALHOUN said he did not admit the fact; but had said that this matter had been so handled as that it might have created suspicion.] A general resolution had been adopted at the close of the last session calling for information on this subject, when the President had transmitted to the House the repealing decree, without affording the information in respect to it which was sought by these resolves, the object of which was, to sweep away entirely the charge which had been made against the Government; to give the Executive a proper opportunity for transmitting to the House information on this subject, which would completely exculpate him. The particularity of the resolutions, objected to by the gentleman, was essential to their object, as describing what information was desired. If such information as was desired was in the Office of State, it required a particular call to elicit it, as the general resolution adopted at the end of the last session had not brought it forth.

Mr. WEBSTER said he had not been aware that there was any particular form of calls for information. He should rather have supposed that the form would be governed by a general regard to the purpose in view; that questions would be therein asked bearing on the points in relation to which information was wished for. He asked the gentleman whether there was not apparent on the public records the necessity of calling on the Executive, if at all, for information through whom this decree had been first received. The French Minister had declared that the decree had been transmitted through two channels. Was not the inquiry, then, material through which, if either, it had been received? Mr. W. said he would not go the whole length which the gentleman from South Carolina had gone, in saying that suspicion had attached to the Government on this head. He would say that for his part he entertained none. The particularity of the call arose from the nature of the information wished; and if there was novelty in the form, it was because a similar case had never arisen.

Mr. CALHOUN said he was glad the gentleman had at last come to the point. The gentleman from New Hampshire, adverting to the correspondence of Mr. Barlow, says that the French decree had been alleged to have been transmitted through two sources to our Government. The first of these resolves inquires through whom and in what manner this decree had been communicated. The second and third resolutions embrace the object avowed by the gentleman, viz: an inquiry whether the decree in question had been received through either of the two channels designated by the Duke of Bassano. Why, then, after being thus precise in two separate resolutions, was the President, in addition to these specific inquiries, called upon to inform the House through whom and in what manner the decree had been received by him? Was not this language (wholly unnecessary with the object which the gentleman avowed) calculated to bring up a third idea, not avowed by the mover, that the decree might have been received through some other channel than either of those through which the Duke of Bassano had declared to Mr. Barlow that he had forwarded it? If inquiry was meant only as to the two modes of communication indicated in the correspondence, the terms of the first resolve were unnecessary as well as indecorous; if otherwise, there were no facts on which to rest suspicion or ground inquiry.

Mr. CALHOUN concluded by moving to strike out of the resolution the words "by whom and in what manner."

Mr. McKEE rose for the purpose of proposing an amendment which, he said, would supersede the one proposed by the gentleman from South Carolina. His object was to strike out the whole of the resolutions, and in lieu thereof insert a resolution, which he read, calling upon the President generally for information on this head. He said he was persuaded there was no gentleman in the House desirous to detain from the public eye any information which he had any reason to believe calculated at all to enlighten the public mind, or mature the opinions of gentlemen of the House in relation to our concerns with foreign nations. But there certainly was something due to the Chief Magistrate of the nation. It was impossible for any man to read the resolutions without perceiving that they might be construed injuriously to the Executive. Why not ask for the information desired in respectful terms? Was the House likely to arrive at its object in this way sooner than by a decorous and respectful course? He saw no propriety in the particular terms of the resolution, especially when the information desired might be as easily obtained by pursuing a different course. He was as anxious as the gentleman who moved the resolutions to lay before the nation every particle of information in relation to the decree dated the 28th of April, 1811. So far as he was informed, the conduct of France in relation to that matter was, as he had frequently believed it to be, insincere, base, and abominable. He wished that every man in the nation might see and detest it.

Mr. SHEFFEY said the honorable member from Kentucky might as well vote against the inquiry altogether, as substitute the motion which he had read. It was, no doubt, well known to that gentleman, that a resolution, in the very terms perhaps which he had read, had been adopted at the last session, the result of which we have seen. The same answer might be expected to the resolve read by the gentleman, if it was adopted in preference to those now under consideration.

Mr. McKEE said he had no knowledge of the adoption, at the last session, of a resolution similar to that which he had moved. If such an one could be shown on the Journals, he would withdraw his motion.

Mr. SHEFFEY then quoted the Journal of the 1st of March last, containing a resolution, moved by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, calling for an authenticated copy of the decree, purporting to be a revocation of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, and also for information as to the time and manner of its communication, &c.

I believe it will be found, continued Mr. S., that this motion, then adopted, substantially embraces the requisition contained in the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky. That resolution required a copy of the decree in question, together with information of the time and manner of its communication, and also any correspondence or facts related thereto. I ask the gentleman whether he recollects the result of this inquiry? Did we get any information as to the time and manner of promulgating that decree? We had communicated to us, without any explanation or declaration on the part of the Executive, several extracts of letters from Mr. Barlow to the Secretary of State, in one of which he expressly said, that the Duke of Bassano did state that the repealing decree had been communicated to our Government through two channels, at as early a date as May, 1811. What follows? Either the assertion of the Duke of Bassano is true or it is not true. Whether it be or be not, is a matter highly important to this nation, to the people, to their Representatives, to whom is committed the administration and superintendence of their affairs; not only so far as the Constitution has, committed a legislative duty to this House, but, also, so far as it is its duty to see that the powers confided to other departments of the Government are honestly and fairly executed. If the President in 1811 was possessed of this decree, as has been asserted by the French Minister, I hesitate not to pronounce, under the high responsibility of my situation, as a Member of the Grand Inquest of the Nation, that the conduct of the President deserves not only the scrutiny but the reprehension of the nation; for such information would show that the nation has been involved in war without the least necessity. It is manifest that if this decree was known to our Government in 1811, and had been known to the people, and used in the manner it ought to have been, the Orders in Council, the great cause of the war, would have been done away; and, if they had, would any man say that we should have been plunged into the disastrous and ruinous war in which we are now engaged? It is undeniable, if the Orders in Council had been repealed, that we should not have been engaged in the present war. I conceive that the resolutions ought to be specific, to remain as they are. If we want any information at all, it is that designated in the words moved to be expunged by the gentleman from South Carolina. It may turn out, and I hope it will, that the French assertion in this respect was, as French assertions generally are, false, and to have been only an attempt further to inveigle us. I hope that will turn out to be the case; in some degree I am confident such will prove to be the fact. Although I do not agree with the President of the United States in his present policy, charity and my own opinion of his personal character forbid me from believing that the President could have had this decree in his possession for more than two years, and that merely to preserve the consistency of his proclamation of November, 1810, he should have suppressed it. I will not believe it; I will, until it shall prove to be otherwise, believe the French assertion to be false.

Experience has shown, sir, that any resolution calling for the information in general terms will not answer the purpose. The very circumstance of a resolution in general terms, such as I have read, having been adopted on the 1st of March, 1813, and not extracting the information desired, makes it extremely necessary that the resolution now to be passed should be precise and definite as to the information required; that it should point distinctly to the object, and leave nothing to the discretion of the Executive, except that discretion which all admit ought to be granted him; that is, a discretion whether or not the information asked would injuriously affect the public interest. Sir, I expect from the resolution proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky as a substitute, nothing of that kind of information which we deem important. And is it not important? Has there not been a cloud hanging over the Executive since the last night of the last session of Congress? Have not circumstances given something like a color to the idea that the Chief Magistrate of a free people could do an act which would disgrace a tyrant who claims the throne by divine right or by any other right? For of such a character would be the withholding information, an act which would plunge the nation into war, rather than be convicted of having proclaimed a falsity. I have hitherto believed, whatever difference there may be as to the objects of the several parties in the Government, that there has been perfect purity on all sides, and hope not to be compelled to change that opinion. Is it not important to gentlemen on the other side of the House that they should assent to the resolutions as they now stand? If a resolution in general terms be substituted for them, what will the world say? They would say that gentlemen were afraid to see the light; that they refused the information sought for, because, if brought out, it would have damned their cause. I do not believe information will be had of such a character. But as the assertion of the Duke of Bassano has been made, if we pass a resolution on the subject at all, it should unquestionably point to the particular information desired.

Mr. FISK rose but to say a word or two in reply to the gentleman from Virginia. I could wish, said Mr. F., when questions of a public nature are brought before the House, with the express view of giving information, that the statements on which they are founded might be correct. I deny entirely the conclusion just drawn, that if the Executive was in possession of this information, and had communicated it, it would have prevented the war. Is it not known to the nation that the British Minister, Mr. Foster, after quibbling for months, was at length brought by Mr. Monroe to a definitive answer, that if the French decrees were repealed, the Orders in Council would not be revoked? And, are we now to be told, if that decree of repeal had been produced, it would have prevented the war? I presume it will be found that the decree was not in possession of our Government; but, if it had been, its promulgation would not have prevented the war. Mr. F. said he had only risen to express this idea, and to state his surprise to hear every attempt made on every occasion to shield the British Government from blame, and to impute it to our own Government.

Mr. McKEE said that nothing was more foreign from his wishes than to prevent the disclosure of every species of testimony which was in the Department of State on this subject. He was confident in his own mind that the specifications in the resolution would not elicit more information than if its terms were general. It was due to candor to state, however, that he had been totally unapprized of the passage of the resolution cited from the journals of the last session, when he moved his amendment. He had not been in his place when it had passed, and it had escaped his observation. Although he retained his impression that the resolutions contained unnecessary insinuations, and were not sufficiently respectful in their terms, he should for the present withdraw his proposed amendment, reserving to himself the right to vote against the resolves altogether, if on further reflection he should retain his hostility to them.

Mr. CALHOUN said he had hoped that there would have been no division of opinion on this subject—that there would have been no objection to such a modification of this resolution as had been proposed by him. He would state the circumstance which he thought ought to govern gentlemen in paying some little deference to the feelings and wishes of those on this side of the House. What were the facts on which the resolutions were grounded? A few days before the end of the last session of Congress, on motion of a gentleman from Maryland, a resolution was adopted calling on the President for certain information relative to our relations with France. The President, on the next day but one, that is, on the last day of the session, made a communication, which, among other things, stated a conversation which had taken place between Mr. Barlow, our late Minister to France, and the Duke of Bassano, relative to the repeal of the French decrees. Mr. Barlow expressed his surprise when the decree of 28th April, 1811, was produced, that it had been so long concealed. The Duke of Bassano replied, that it had been communicated to our Minister in France, and the French Minister in this country, at the time it was issued. It is fair to acknowledge that that order must have been antedated, or concealed by the French Government, or communicated to the Executive, and by them concealed. Whatever form of inquiry gentlemen might think proper to adopt, by which to prove that the decree was antedated or concealed, Mr. C. was willing should be adopted. The House ought not, however, in the present stage of this business, to presume that the repealing decree had been communicated to the Executive and by him concealed. He would not attribute such motives to the gentleman from New Hampshire—he was too honorable to be actuated by them. No man who looks into his own heart and finds purity there, will be liable to misrepresent the motives of others. The resolution, as hastily read, would nevertheless convey the idea to which he had just alluded. He wished the gentleman from New Hampshire, then, would consent to expunge these words; and he asked it the more confidently, as the gentleman himself had shown that those words were mere surplage, because the object which he professed to have in view was embraced in two distinct resolutions which follow the first. If, when the President should make a reply to the resolutions thus amended, there should be any circumstance leading to a suspicion of concealment, it would be competent to any gentleman to move an additional explanatory resolution; and Mr. C. distinctly pledged himself for one, should any ambiguity appear in the reply, that he would join gentlemen in voting for further inquiry. But he had the firmest belief that nothing was withheld that was necessary to be known, and that all would be satisfactorily cleared up.

Before he sat down, he would advert to one thing. The gentleman from New Hampshire, in moving these resolves, said (according to the report of his speech in the National Intelligencer) to this effect: that the question at issue between the Governments of America and Great Britain, on which the declaration of war turned, was, whether the French decrees were or were not repealed. And the gentleman from Virginia had to-day spoken to the same effect. Mr. C. said he would not, on the present occasion, go to the trouble of dilating at large on that point; but he would observe that the gentleman had presumed to do for us in this case what would be considered very extraordinary to have been done in a suit at law. He, the defendant in the action, had drawn the declaration for the plaintiff, and pointed out the issue. This was as unfair in a political as it would be in a legal contest. Mr. C. said he had always distinctly contended for the right to consider the injuries done to us by each belligerent on their own ground. This had been his course, because a different one would have been as unworthy a nation, as it would have been unworthy of an individual. What! said he, shall we make the right of obtaining redress from England dependent on the justice of France? He, for his part, would take a higher, a different ground. He saw what had led the gentleman into error—he had mistaken the means of redress for the injury to be redressed. This country had, indeed, in its great efforts to preserve peace and neutrality, endeavored to get one of the belligerents to repeal its offensive edicts, in order to induce the other to do the same. Our Government (said Mr. C.) did descend one step in passing the act of 1810, under which France did (or, as the gentlemen over the way would say, pretended to) repeal her decrees of Berlin and Milan. Britain did refuse to proceed pari passu with France in this repeal. I will now place this question at rest forever; this fact shall hereafter forever be without contradiction. England did say to this country, even if France did repeal her decrees in relation to us she would not repeal her Orders in Council. This she did say by the solemn declaration of the Prince Regent, dated 21st April 1812. No gentleman dare hereafter reiterate the statement that if France had bona fide repealed her decrees, as regards America, England would have followed her example. Most indubitably gentlemen who so highly appreciate British faith will not discredit the evidence I produce. By some unaccountable means they have heretofore contrived to throw a cloud over it, to keep it out of sight. A further evidence in proof of my assertion is, that when there was no longer a shade of doubt hanging over the repeal of the French decrees—that is to say, for thirty-five days after the official communication to the British Government of the French decree bearing date the 28th April, 1811—no repeal of the Orders in Council took place. What process was going on in Britain in that interval? During these days a most laborious inquiry was in progress in the House of Commons, into the effects, beneficial or otherwise, produced on the commercial interest of Britain by her Orders in Council of 1807 and 1809; during all which time the British Ministry not only approbated and supported them, but took higher ground in relation to them than they had ever done before. They entirely gave up the pretended retaliatory character of the Orders in Council; they were bound to give it up. Men of common sense could no longer have defended them on that ground. The question was, in terms, whether or not our commerce, that is neutral commerce, should be made subservient to British monopoly. And how, finally, were the Orders in Council repealed? After it had been made clear as the light of the sun in heaven, that they were injurious to British commerce. Will the gentleman from Virginia now say that England would have repealed her Orders in Council, as to us, if she had been convinced that France had in the same manner revoked or modified her decrees? The gentleman dare not say it. No, sir, he dare not, because I shall prove him guilty of falsity if he does. His known integrity and candor are too great to permit him to say it. He dare not say, then, that if the French decree of repeal had been known, the British orders would have been repealed, and the war thus prevented.

[Mr. STOCKTON here spoke to order. He wished to know whether personal threats were admissible on the floor—whether any gentleman could be permitted to say that another dare not say any particular thing.]

The SPEAKER said he did not understand the gentleman as having used a personal threat.]

Mr. CALHOUN continued. He wished it to be distinctly understood, that he had no personal meaning in what he said. He merely had said that the gentleman dare not, as a man of veracity, assert a fact otherwise than that fact is. He was sorry the gentleman from New Jersey, much more than the gentleman from Virginia himself, should misunderstand him. I will be more particular, said Mr. C. I assert that two and two make four; and I say no gentleman dare to contradict it. I say so on conviction of the certainty of the fact. Sir, although warm in my country's cause, nothing shall ever induce me unnecessarily to wound the feelings of any gentleman in this House, more especially of the gentleman from Virginia, with whom I have never been so unfortunate as to come in collision. I may be warm, sir; I have a right to be so. I was one of the advocates of the present war. I considered the interests and rights of the nation compromised in the question, and I was bound to vote for it. I am therefore mortified to see it placed on ground on which it ought not to stand. I am mortified to hear the misstatements which prevail on this subject. The cause of my country is that in whose behalf I am now warm, and ever hope to be so. It is a cause on the truth and justice of which I would stake my all—though on its ultimate success I cannot, for that is yet in the womb of time.

I have condescended, sir, to view this question for a moment on the ground of the relative conduct of France and Great Britain. Not that I believe the Government ought to descend, in the pursuit of a magnanimous policy, to a scholastic view, which nation has done us the first or the greatest injury. Such considerations would never enter into the view of a statesman. The question is, how we can best redress the wrongs of the country. I have ever regretted that the injuries of the belligerents should for a moment have been viewed in their retaliatory character, notwithstanding the excellence of the motive—a love of peace, and a desire to maintain it. I would have taken a higher ground; and the Government, finding all their pacific efforts were in vain were compelled at length to appeal to the last resort. An opposite view of this question appears to me ridiculous, if I dare mingle ridicule with a question of such seriousness. Is it not absurd to contend that we ought to suffer ourselves to be beaten to death, whilst engaged in abstract philosophic inquiries who gave us the first blow? In the whole of this contest of restrictions, I shall ever deem the conduct of France to have been improper. I stand here only as the assertor of American rights, the vindicator of the American cause. I will not presume that the President had received the decree in question and concealed it—and the only modification I ask of these resolutions, is to divest them of that imputation, which they appear to convey. Thus modified, I shall cheerfully vote for them, to afford to gentlemen in opposition the most liberal opportunity of obtaining all the information they can wish.

Mr. HANSON said the part of the resolution which the gentleman from South Carolina regarded as so exceptionable, conveying, as he supposed, an insinuation against the President highly disrespectful and unwarrantable, was the very part he most wished to retain. Those words expunged, the pith, the essence of the resolution was extracted, and nothing would remain to be acted on. It would be equivalent to a rejection of all the resolutions, because the first resolution was the pivot upon which the rest turned—take that away, the key-stone of the arch was removed and the whole fabric must necessarily fall.

Mr. H. said he had not the strength, if he had the inclination, to wade through the volumes of documentary evidence which gentlemen seemed inclined to drag into the discussion to defend their consistency and justify the measures preceding and connected with this war—nor was this a proper stage of the discussion to go into a general view of our foreign relations, and particularly the negotiation with the French Government. To begin with the late Mr. Secretary Smith and dissect all that was written by that gentleman, then to pass to Mr. Monroe's correspondence with Mr. Foster; to proceed next to an examination of all that came from the Dukes of Cadore and Bassano, Mr. Russell, Mr. Barlow, Mr. Pinkney, the Marquis of Wellesley, and lastly, from the youth to whom were committed our concerns as Chargé des Affaires in England, would be to lose one's self in a labyrinth of diplomacy, from which it would require the enterprise and wit of a Theseus, aided by the clue of an Ariadne, to be extricated.

Mr. H. could not but express his surprise that any opposition should be made, by the friends of the Administration, to the resolutions under consideration; that it was indeed to have been expected that an early opportunity would be sought by the gentlemen themselves to remove from the public mind injurious and well founded suspicions against the Executive, spread everywhere and daily acquiring strength; that it was to have been expected that such an opportunity would have been earnestly sought and eagerly embraced, to vindicate the honor of Administration, by refuting one of the most insulting and outrageous imputations of falsehood, fraud, and imposture, ever submitted to by one independent Power from another. That it was to have been expected the guardians of the national honor would have displayed a quick and lively sensibility to whatever affected the character of the country; and that their own share of responsibility, a just sense of what was due to themselves, would have suggested to gentlemen on the other side the necessity of some exculpatory course, some voluntary proceeding, to wipe away the stain cast upon their characters by the presumptuous tool of a foreign despot. Should the resolutions be rejected, the public is bound to believe, the people inevitably will believe, either that the important document which we ask to be laid before the nation was suppressed, for the most corrupt purposes, or that, rather than risk the displeasure of France, by exculpating the Executive and itself, this House prefers to sanction, nay, recommend, a negative vote, a continued concealment of evidence, a suppression of a declaration exposing the "courtly insincerity," the duplicity, and falsehood, of France.

Mr. H. said, that he wished to dismiss from the discussion all the rubbish and trumpery which might be raked together in the Department of State, and brought to bear upon this question; he wished to discard all extraneous matter with which it might be attempted to encumber the question, in order to direct the attention of the people from the true subject of inquiry. Let us, said he, simplify the question, and present it in a form calculated to meet the apprehension of every man, not having an unaccountable obliquity of vision, or tortured by a distressing density of intellect. And how stands the question? Simply and plainly thus: shall the Chief Magistrate of this nation rest under the foul imputation of having done a deed at the bare mention of which honor blushes—the cheek of charity must mantle—a deed which, in a better age, would have brought a monarch to the block? Or will the National Legislature afford that Chief Magistrate an opportunity (which opportunity, to be sure, might have been taken) to acquit himself by his own mere denial of the charges, and thus inculpate his imperial accuser, who has officially promulgated, I trust, an unqualified untruth, vitally affecting the honor of Government? This plain proposition presented to the minds of gentlemen, could they doubt or hesitate in their decision? Forced, driven to the alternative of flying in the face of imperial ire, and the unavoidable degradation of submitting to an allegation of treachery to this people by their rulers, it was but reasonable to expect a prompt decision in favor of the call for information. As much as gentlemen might excel in the art of "making the worse appear the better reason," (and we had abundant proof that skillful sophists were on the floor,) it was not in the power of human ingenuity, sophistry itself could not vary the true, simple statement of the case, The resolutions rejected, or so altered as to defeat the fair purpose of their honorable mover, the call for particular information refused, and the inference was irresistible; the mind of man could not resist it—a verdict of guilty would be pronounced against Administration by the grand inquest of the nation. On the other hand, let the President confront his accuser, and officially deny the official declaration of the Duke of Bassano, and the national character would be in so much retrieved, the honor of Administration in so far vindicated. For himself, Mr. H. said, he could not help thinking, as an American he could not help hoping, the French Minister would be convicted of a wanton, groundless, official falsehood. Guilt rested somewhere, and he himself hoped it could be fastened on France.

Mr. H. said, that Faber, in his "Sketches of the internal state of France," (a book which ought to be in the hands of every citizen of this and any other country,) said "that in France was exhibited the most extraordinary phenomenon ever known, a moral prodigy unexampled in the history of mankind," which was, "the regular systematic elaborate organization of falsehood, as the basis of the Government and the soul of all its public acts."

Now, sir, said he, when the question is put whether this Government will exhibit to the world the evidence to sustain this declaration, at least as far as Administration is concerned, and so demonstrate to the world the fraud and rank corruption of the military despotism so well described by the author mentioned, or tacitly admit the imputation against the President of having betrayed the people and truckled to a tyrant, there should be no division upon the question; a zealous enthusiastic rivalry should be displayed by the two parties in the House in rallying round the honor of their own Government. It was but reasonable to expect that few, very few, would be found hardy enough to vote in the negative.

As a party man, I am free to confess said Mr. H., it will be the cause of no great agony of grief with me, to see the resolutions rejected. But love of country, the great and sole foundation of all public virtue, cheerfully yields the triumph which such a vote would assure to the minority. You, sir, are not now to be informed that thousands and hundreds of thousands of the free and enlightened people of this Republic, judging from the mysterious acts of Administration, the constant and (in my judgment) abominable practice of suppressing information, and a curious coincidence in our measures and those of a foreign Power, are firmly persuaded, if not rivetted in the opinion, that the destinies of this nation are directed by a distant hand. They know that France, ever since her regicidal era, when the mild and amiable Louis was butchered, has arrogated and haughtily exercised the right of superseding, by a code of her own, all the sacred and recognised principles of the laws of nations; this France, that fawns over her prey, and courts whom she designs to destroy; whose annals of perfidy, usurpation, and blood, have blotted the history of man, and at last provoked the wrath of the Almighty, whose arm has been made bare to smite the monster identified with her crimes. This people think that France has plundered us of our property without one manly effort to recover or protect it; cramped us in our industry, without our daring to complain; at first assigned limits to our commerce, and finally forced us to unite in measures for its destruction—robbed us of our honor—chained us to the car of the conqueror—coerced us to shout hosannahs to his fame, and fabricate apologies for his misfortunes—twisted a knot about our necks, which we are told the tyrant's sword alone can cut. Will you reject these resolutions, and thus confirm all that will be, can be, and ought to be thought and said touching French influence?

There exists, said Mr. H., another and a very important reason why the majority should proceed cautiously, evincing a delicacy of honor, a nice sensibility, on a question which is to decide upon their pretensions to whatever an honest party properly appreciates. In addition to the intimation by the imperial prime minister that the privations and miseries with which the country has been afflicted for the last year have been brought upon us by the concealment of a document which would have prevented the war, if communicated to Congress; that our smoking and bleeding frontier has been visited with the most awful calamities, through the treachery of our rulers; in addition to these considerations, upon a late and memorable occasion, the "invincible and super-eminent Napoleon" declared to his Conservative Senate of slaves, in pretty direct terms, that we were engaged in a common cause with him. These are his words:

"America has recurred to arms to cause the sovereignty of her flag to be respected. The wishes of the world accompany her in this glorious contest. If it terminates in obliging the enemy of the Continent to recognise the principle that the flag shall protect the merchandise and crew, and that neutrals ought not to submit to paper blockades, (all is conformable to the Treaty of Utrecht,) America will meet the applause of the world."

Such, Mr. Speaker, is the language of the late assumed Autocrat of all the States of the Continent. The war is not to cease until England recognises a new interpolation in the maritime code of nations; in other words, until the Napoleon code is adopted, which shall give to the neutral flag, a piece of striped bunting, backed by quaker cannon, the magical effect of preserving inviolate all that sails under it, of protecting whatever is covered by it. Yes, sir, this new point of international law the "invincible" and "generous conqueror," seated on his imperial throne, covered by a canopy I dare say not less splendid than that above your head, Mr. Speaker, surrounded by his scullion princes and mock grand dignitaries of the Empire, has promulgated for the government of nations—for our guidance—for the government of — The petty men

Who walk under his huge legs, and peep about
To find themselves dishonorable graves.

Mr. H. said, it appears, too, from the same laconic notice our loving friend has designed to take of this most enlightened nation of the world, that with the same solemnity, and on the same occasion, he has declared to the automata around him, "for this new principle the Americans fight," and for so fighting have gained the world's applause, a tyrant's praise, the friendship of a "cut-purse of the Empire and the rule." Yes, the Great Napoleon has written, has spoken, has promulged it to the nations of the world, that we fight Great Britain for such a principle; all is conformable to the Treaty of Utrecht!—while a curious similarity of sentiment is to be found between the late Message of the President and the speech of the Emperor, upon the point, that "the flag shall cover the merchandise and crew"—that free ships shall make free goods.

Is it true or is it false, said Mr. H., that we are fighting to support such pretensions? Such facts we are the panel to try, and, according to my ideas, the decision will be governed by the vote upon these resolutions. Again, is it true? We have the word of Napoleon for it, and "but yesterday his word would have stood against the world." Now, crippled and prostrate, surely there could be no great danger in bringing our Executive into collision with him, whose honor must be protected against an imputed act of malfeasance, presupposing the blackest turpitude. If it be false, boldly fling back the contumely, and hurl indignant defiance in the teeth of the unprincipled, perfidious tyrant. Hesitate, fear not to contradict and expose the man who has dared to assail the integrity and sacred honor of our Government. Mr. H. said it was not for those who might concur with him in opinion, to contradict and quarrel with Bonaparte about the charge of a criminal and impeachable nature against the President, but it was a duty which had especially devolved upon those whose honor and love of country are particularly implicated. He therefore conjured the majority, as they valued their own fame and their country's glory, to surcease, by one consentaneous impulse, all further opposition to the resolutions on the table. A deaf ear may be turned to this entreaty, but the day will not be long coming when they will bitterly regret it.

Mr. H. said he would not be drawn into a discussion of the general merits of the resolutions, as growing out of our foreign relations, upon a motion to strike out from the first resolution. He would postpone such an argument till the proper time arrived; and concluded with expressing a hope that the words pronounced to be offensive would be retained.

When Mr. H. had taken his seat the House adjourned without coming to any decision.

A message from Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants," in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

PETITION OF B. F. POMEROY.

Mr. HOPKINS presented the petition of B. F. Pomeroy, a resident and innkeeper at Buffalo on the Northern frontier, praying compensation for damages sustained in his property during a riot among the soldiery of the United States stationed in that neighborhood, which petition Mr. H. moved to refer to a select committee.

H. OF R.

Petition of B. F. Pomeroy.

JUNE, 1813.

Mr. FISK of New York opposed the reference of this memorial to a select or any other committee, when it was evident the report must be adverse to the prayer of the petition; and moved that it lie on the table. Every citizen has a right to petition, and it is the duty of the House to treat petitioners with respect. But there was also another duty, which the House owed to the character and respectability of its proceedings, which forbade the reference of a petition of this nature. The petition sought indemnity for damages sustained from the lawless violence of a mob of soldiers. Mr. F. said he could not see the distinction between a mob of soldiers and a mob of citizens; and no one, he believed, would pretend to say that the Government was responsible for damages committed by a common mob. No such case, he would venture to say, had ever before presented itself to the Legislature of this nation or any other. Every day the House turned from its door the war-worn soldiers of the Revolution, because their claims were barred by a statute of limitation. And would they listen to a claim of this sort, which had no foundation in reason or justice?

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, in a number of remarks very indistinctly heard, expressed his hope that the petition would be committed, as moved, to a select committee. This was not a new case, as the gentleman supposed. Mr. G. quoted the petition presented only at this session, and referred, from sundry citizens of Indiana Territory, praying compensation for damages committed by the mounted troops from Kentucky on their property.

Mr. FISK said this was a different case; and asked the gentleman whether the damages stated in this petition had been committed by the soldiery in the discharge of their duty.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH replied in the negative. For how could soldiery commit a riot in the discharge of their duty? Mr. G. made some observations going to show that a riot in the execution of military duty was a solecism in terms.

Mr. HOPKINS made a number of remarks in support of his motion for a reference of this petition. What was this case, he asked? The United States had embodied a military force—say for a proper, laudable object; but its physical force was converted to a very different object, and by the aid of the numbers and arms of those thus embodied did injury to a citizen, who could obtain no redress from the individuals who had done the injury. The House could on this subject arrive at but one of two conclusions; either that the military force of the nation is to be considered as beyond the control of its officers, or that the nation is responsible for the conduct of the soldiery. This, however, was not now the question; but whether the House, by refusing to refer the petition, would act upon the principle that the unarmed and defenceless citizens of the nation should have no defence against the unprovoked and lawless violence of armed soldiery. This was a case which well merited consideration, at least, and that was sufficient to insure a reference of the petition.

Mr. FISK again spoke.—That the citizen had his rights, he never would deny; but he also had his obligations. In the case in question the injury done the petitioner was not so unprovoked as gentlemen seem to desire it should appear. This person, he had heard, had asserted, in view of the enemy, in the midst of the soldiers, that the war in which we were engaged was unjust and ruinous, and he hoped that every soldier that entered Canada might be cut off! The gentleman had drawn a distinction between a mob of soldiers and other citizens, because the Government had put arms in the hands of the former. The same argument in our country would apply to every citizen, it being a part of our code of laws, that every citizen should have arms placed in his hands.

Mr. BIGLOW said he apprehended this was not a proper time to enter into the merits of the petition. He rose to show a precedent of reference of such a petition, viz: the petition of sundry inhabitants of Indiana Territory at the last session, on which a report had then been made that their petition was reasonable and ought to be granted. In all cases of lawless depredation committed by soldiers, the individuals injured ought to be compensated.

Mr. RHEA said, that unquestionably all troops of the United States ought to be kept in subordination. He knew of a case which occurred in Tennessee, where certain troops had committed an outrage. The injured party, however, did not apply to the Government for redress, but to a lawyer to bring suit against the commanding officer. He did so, and obtained judgment against him; and in Mr. R's. opinion this course ought to be pursued in all cases. A different course would open a wide field to a flood of unnecessary petitions.

Mr. GROSVENOR said he knew of no reason which should arrest this petition in the ordinary course proposed to be given to it, particularly when it was proved that one of a similar nature had been referred. Upon what ground it was objected to refer it, he could not conceive. Was it, as his colleague appeared to suggest, because a man had taken upon himself to use intemperate expressions in relation to the Government? Will gentlemen suffer the idea to go forth, that, for the expression of his opinion, a man may be mobbed and his house destroyed with impunity by the military, or any other mob? Such a doctrine he knew had been held by some abandoned persons out of the House, but never before heard, nor ever expected to be heard, on this floor. Intemperate expressions of individuals ought to have no effect, if these petitions were couched in decorous terms.

Mr. FISK said, the gentleman was entirely mistaken if he understood him to mention the intemperance of the petitioner's language, which provoked the riot, as a reason against the reference of his petition; his language had been cited in reply to the suggestion, that the attack on his property was entirely unprovoked.

The motion to lay the petition on the table was negatived.

Mr. FISK then said, it had uniformly been his opinion, that all petitions asking for money should go to the Committee of Claims. He therefore moved, that this petition, instead of going to a select committee, should be referred to that Committee.

Mr. F.'s motion was carried, 81 to 68.

Mr. BEALL presented the memorial of S. Vansycoe and Gilson and Jones, praying the payment of a bill drawn by one of the Assistant Quartermasters General, payment of which had been declined at the Department of War.—Referred to the Committee of Claims.

Some conversation arising on the proper mode of disposing of this petition, the SPEAKER observed, more as he said by way of suggestion than to lay down a rule, that debate on the merits of petitions, arising on the question of their reference, was irregular and ought to be avoided, as unnecessarily consuming the time of the House; as had been illustrated in a case which had this day occurred.

FRENCH DECREES.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolutions moved by Mr. WEBSTER, calling for particular information on the subject of the documents purporting to be a repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan.

Mr. FARROW said, he could not agree with the honorable member from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT,) in wishing the resolutions before the House to pass. The twelfth Congress passed a resolution, requesting the Executive to give the information that is again called for. He did return an answer, which was satisfactorily received by the last Congress. Information, in reply to those inquiries, is not the object of the honorable member from New Hampshire. If the information now sought for was the true object, it was as much wanting the first day or week of the session as at this time, and it would have been as proper to have moved the resolutions before you then, as at this time. Congress met the first and second weeks of the session, and adjourned almost as soon as they met—no business before the House—waiting for the Committee of Ways and Means to prepare their report. The said committee has now furnished the House with their report; and the moment after the report was made those resolutions were moved. Why should that have been the favorable moment for their appearance? Those resolutions are intended as a plea in bar to the demand of this nation for money.

[Mr. SPEAKER stated that it was not proper to state the motives of the member from New Hampshire.]

Mr. F. proceeded, and remarked, that the honorable member from Virginia (Mr. SHEFFY) observed, that this Government had been wickedly involved in war with England. Mr. F. contended, that as war had been declared by the Constitutional authority, that it did not now become the duty of the thirteenth Congress to inquire into the policy of the war; that, as to his part, he was not sent here for that purpose. But, as he understood, this session was called to provide ways and means for carrying on the war. Suppose, upon an inquiry, that it should be found that it was not the policy of this country to go to war. Congress cannot make peace; one nation can make war, but it requires two to make peace. Therefore, to go into the inquiry would be a nugatory act, and an unnecessary waste of time. He, therefore, moved, that the consideration of the resolutions before the House be indefinitely postponed.

Mr. OAKLEY.—Mr. Speaker, my slight acquaintance with the rules of the House, does not enable me to determine whether the motion just made by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. FARROW,) to postpone indefinitely the consideration of the resolutions now before us, so far supersedes the motion yesterday made by his honorable colleague, (Mr. CALHOUN,) to amend the first of these resolutions, as to render it improper for me, in this stage of the debate, to reply to the observations of the latter gentleman in support of his amendment. If I am in order in pursuing this course, I shall venture to call the attention of the House, in the first instance, to the nature of the amendment, and its effect on the resolutions under discussion.

The gentleman from South Carolina, in proposing this amendment, professed, and no doubt with great sincerity, a willingness to afford all the information which is desired on the subjects embraced by these resolutions; but he seemed to think that the terms of the resolution, which he wishes to amend, are too particular to comport with the respect due from this House to the Chief Magistrate—as they appear to afford the ground of an inference, that to a call for information in a more general shape, he might be disposed to make an unsatisfactory or evasive answer. The gentleman seemed also to think, that the objects intended to be obtained by the words which he proposes to strike out, are substantially included in the second and third resolutions; and he further objects, that although all the information in the possession of the Government, as to the time at which the first intelligence of the decree of the French Government, of the 28th April, 1811, was received, may properly be demanded by this House—still it would be unprecedented and improper to inquire as to the manner in which such intelligence was obtained, or the agents through whom it was communicated; or, at all events, that these things ought to be the subject of a distinct and future inquiry, if the answer of the Executive to the resolution in its general form should render such an inquiry important.

I am unable, sir, to discern in what point of view this resolution can be considered as disrespectful to the Executive. If particular information is required, particular inquiries must necessarily be made. It will be recollected by the

JUNE, 1813.

House, that the resolution adopted near the close of the last session, on the motion of the honorable gentleman from Maryland behind me, (Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH,) and in reply to which the House received the information now in their possession, relative to the French decree in question, was in a more general form than that now under consideration. It is to be presumed that the Executive, in answer to that resolution, gave to the House all the facts which he considered as coming properly within its scope and meaning; and yet it must be perceived that his answer is wholly unsatisfactory, and that the necessity for the present resolution has grown out of the defective information then given to the House. It is proper, therefore, that this call should be precise in its terms, and that the attention of the Executive should be particularly directed to the points on which information is deemed important.

Nor, sir, can I agree with the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, that the second and third resolutions are calculated to produce the effect intended by the words which he proposes to strike out of the first. The object of the second resolution is to ascertain whether Mr. Russell has ever admitted or denied to his Government the truth of the declaration of the Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow. It will be acknowledged, that to a complete vindication of the character of the Administration, an explicit denial by Mr. Russell of the truth of that declaration is absolutely essential. And, sir, as to the third resolution, it is equally important that it should be explicitly known, whether the Minister of France has ever made any communication to this Government on the subject of that decree. But it will be perceived, that the terms of the first resolution may be fully complied with by the Executive, without explicitly saying to this House whether such a denial on the one hand, or such a communication on the other, has ever been made. Facts, so important as these, ought not to rest on matter of inference from any general answer of the Executive, but they ought to be established by a direct and positive declaration.

Neither, sir, can I agree with the honorable gentleman, that it is unprecedented or improper for this House to inquire as to the manner in which the information required by this resolution was obtained by the Government, or the agency through which such information was derived. That such an inquiry is not unprecedented, will appear sufficiently by the resolution yesterday read from the Journals by my venerable colleague (Mr. BENSON.) But, sir, were it unprecedented, it is time that a precedent should be made. The calls of this House for information on subjects of deep importance, ought to be so specific in their terms, and so direct in their object, as to be incapable of being either misunderstood or evaded. Nor, sir, can such inquiry be improper. The agents of this Government, from the highest to the lowest, are constitutionally subject to the animadversions of this House; and, if the nature of the case require it, to the legal animadversion of this House in the due exercise of its power of impeachment. If, then, in relation to the subject-matter of these resolutions, any agent of the Government has violated his duty, it is important that this House should know it; and if the agent of any foreign Power has been guilty of withholding from this Government important information, when directed to communicate it, it is equally necessary that the fact should be disclosed; for, although this House may not possess the power of inflicting the punishment due to such an offence, yet it may adopt, and ought to adopt, such measures as would compel the Executive to demand the recall of that agent by his own Government. I would then prosecute this inquiry with rigor and perseverance, although the result might implicate the predecessor of Mr. Barlow at the Court of France, or reach even the representative of the truth and honor of his Imperial and Royal Majesty near the United States.

But, sir, if the reasons urged by the gentleman from South Carolina are well founded, they apply with greater force to show the impropriety of the second and third resolutions, than of the first; and I foresee, that if this resolution is amended in the manner now proposed, we shall soon hear a motion to reject those which follow. It is, then, because I consider this amendment calculated to frustrate the object of these resolutions, and to defeat the inquiry contemplated by them; and because such an intention is now distinctly avowed by the motion to postpone them indefinitely, that I must beg the indulgence of the House while I state, as concisely as I am able, the view which I have taken of the whole subject now before us.

In doing this, sir, I shall not follow the example of the gentleman from South Carolina, by indulging in an unnecessary warmth, which may serve to irritate, but never to convince. Nor, sir, shall I attempt any reply to most of the observations which have fallen from the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. WRIGHT.) That gentleman seemed to have in view a general defence of the conduct of the Administration in its management of our foreign relations—a subject not connected with the resolutions now before the House, and which would necessarily lead us into a wide field of debate, where little of novelty is to be found. Neither shall I advert to the remarks of that gentleman, which seemed to me designed to reflect on the character of this side of the House—because I have understood that the honorable gentleman is privileged to say many things, which it is not considered incumbent on any one here to answer. But I shall proceed with much coolness, and as plainly as the nature of the case may demand, to state the reasons which have produced a complete conviction on my mind, that the adoption of these resolutions, and a satisfactory answer to them by the Executive, are absolutely necessary to the vindication of the national honor.

To understand correctly the nature and importance of the subject now under discussion, it is requisite to bring into view the state of our relations with France and Great Britain, at the date of the decree of the 28th of April, 1811. I am not about to enter at large into the subject of the French decrees, and the British Orders in Council. It is not important here to do so; and, if it were, a due respect for the talents of eminent gentlemen who have gone before me, would deter me from travelling over ground so thoroughly explored. It would be more than vain in me to hope to present any new views of a subject so completely exhausted. It is sufficient for my purpose to state such facts respecting these decrees and orders, and the policy pursued by our Government in relation to them, as I have understood to be generally admitted.

The blockade of May, 1806, established by the British Government, although in the first instance considered by the present Secretary of State as a conciliatory measure, was afterwards alleged by France, and then by our own Administration, to be hostile to our neutral rights, and a direct violation of the laws of nations. France, claiming a right to retaliate, promulgated in October following the Berlin decree. To this succeeded, on the same alleged ground of retaliation, the Orders in Council, and to these the decree of Milan. Each of the belligerent Powers thus rested the justification of its hostile edicts on the previous alleged injustice and wrongs of the other. Our Administration, though denying in terms the existence of this right of retaliation, yet in its acts and its correspondence seemed to recognise it. It labored hard to convince each belligerent, that each was the original aggressor, and, by a long course of humiliating solicitation and entreaty, it endeavored to induce each to take the lead in rescinding the edicts of which we complained. At length, by the act of Congress of the 1st of May, 1810, it was provided that whenever either France or England should so revoke her decrees or orders, that they should cease to violate the neutral rights of the United States, the President should by proclamation declare the fact, and that from thenceforth the act of non-intercourse should cease to operate against the Power thus revoking; and that if, within three months after such proclamation, the other Power did not also revoke, the provisions of that act should be enforced against it. In this state of things a declaration was made by the French Minister of Foreign Affairs to the American Minister at Paris, on the 5th of August, 1810, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan were revoked, and would cease to have effect on the 1st of November following. The President of the United States considering this declaration as amounting to a repeal of these decrees, within the meaning of the act of the 1st of May, and implicitly confiding that that declaration would be fulfilled in good faith by the French Government, on the 2d day of November, 1810, published his proclamation announcing the fact that these decrees were repealed. A demand was made on the British Government to follow the example thus set by France. On the part of that Government it was contended that the declaration of the French Minister was not such a formal act as ought to be required by the United States, and that the French decrees ought to be revoked in a manner as authentic as that in which they were promulgated. That even if there were no objections to that declaration on that ground, if it was to be considered a repeal at all, it was clearly a repeal depending on a condition precedent to be performed by the United States, and that such a conditional revocation did not come within the meaning of the act of Congress. She therefore refused to revoke the Orders in Council, and the provisions of the non-intercourse act were revived against her by the act of the 2d of March, 1811.

On the 21st of April, 1812, by a declaration of the British Government, it was provided, that "if at any time thereafter, the Berlin and Milan decrees should, by some authentic act of the French Government, publicly promulgated, be absolutely and unconditionally repealed, then and from thenceforth the Orders in Council should be wholly and absolutely revoked." Mr. Barlow, then the Minister of the United States at Paris, having received this declaration, addressed a note to the Duke of Bassano, dated the first of May, 1812, in which is the following passage: "It is much to be desired that the French Government would now make and publish an authentic act, declaring the Berlin and Milan decrees, as relative to the United States, to have ceased in November, 1810; declaring that they have not been applied in any instance since that time, and that they shall not be so applied in future." By the letter of the 12th of May, 1812, from Mr. Barlow to the Secretary of State, we are informed, that in a conversation with the Duke of Bassano on the subject of that note, there appeared a "singular reluctance" on the part of the French Minister to answer it. In that conversation, we, for the first time, hear of the decrees of the French Government of the 28th of April, 1811. "When, in the conversation above alluded to," says Mr. Barlow, "the Duke first produced to me the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, I made no comment on the strange manner in which it had been so long concealed from me, and probably from you. I only asked him if that decree had been published. He said no; but, he declared, it had been communicated to my predecessor here, and likewise sent to Mr. Serrurier, with orders to communicate it to you." On the 20th of May, 1812, this decree was for the first time made known to the British Government. On the 18th of June war was declared by the United States. On the 23d of the same month the Orders in Council were repealed. On the 4th of November last, the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, was first laid before Congress; and on the 3d of March last, the letter of Mr. Barlow to the Secretary of State of the 12th of May, 1812, containing the declaration of the Duke of Bassano relative to that decree, was drawn from the Executive by the resolution adopted by this House on the motion of my friend from Maryland.

I have thus, sir, endeavored to give a concise, and I flatter myself, a correct statement of facts connected with the decrees and orders of France and Great Britain, and with the measures adopted by the United States in relation to them. From this statement, we shall not be at a loss to discover the import of the declaration of the Duke of Bassano, and the nature and extent of the charge which that declaration fixes on the honor of this country, and the men who administer its Government. Great Britain professed always, without doubt, until her declaration of the 21st of April, 1812, her readiness to proceed "pari passu" with France in a revocation of her edicts against neutral commerce. She called repeatedly for authentic evidence of the alleged repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees. The decree of the 28th of April, 1811, constituted that evidence. On the supposition that that decree was made at the time it bears date, then, has it been concealed, either by the French Government or our own, or by both, in concert, for the purpose of preventing the repeal of the Orders in Council, and thus cheating and betraying Congress and this people into the ruinous war under which we are now suffering. The declaration of the Duke of Bassano fixes this charge exclusively on the American Government. It is a serious charge, and well merits an examination of the grounds on which it rests.

H. of R.

French Decrees.

I will not, sir, on this occasion say what is my own opinion of the truth of this allegation of the French Minister of Foreign Affairs. It is not necessary that I should do so. But it well becomes gentlemen on the other side of the House, who consider themselves the guardians of the honor of the Administration; it well becomes us all, who are in truth the guardians of the national honor, to consider what opinion on this subject would be formed by a dispassionate man upon the evidence now before the public. Such a man must consider the Governments of the United States and France at issue on a point deeply affecting the honor of both. The question between them, to his mind, is plain and simple. Did the French Minister of Foreign Affairs declare a positive official falsehood; or has this Administration suppressed an important document, with a view of plunging this nation into war with England?

There are, sir, many considerations which would at once present themselves to the mind of such a man in support of the truth of the Duke of Bassano's declaration. Let us adopt the train of reasoning which he would naturally pursue, and see to what conclusion it will lead us.

In the first place, then, this declaration of the Duke of Bassano is a formal, official declaration of the French Government made through its Minister of Foreign Affairs. The American Minister at Paris immediately on the receipt of the declaration of the British Government of the 21st of April, 1812, by a note to the Duke of Bassano, solicits that France would then make and publish an authentic repeal of her decrees. In a subsequent official conversation between Mr. Barlow and the French Minister, the latter produces the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, and explicitly declares, that that decree, being the authentic act required by Great Britain, and furnishing complete evidence of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, had been made known to the Government of the United States. No declaration could be more formal. The personal veracity of the French Minister, his official character, and the faith and honor of the French Government, are all pledged for its truth. A declaration thus solemnly made by one Government in its official intercourse with another, is at all times entitled to credit.

But it may be urged that the character of the French Government for bad faith is such, that no implicit reliance ought to be placed on its official acts; that its history shows, that it has always been ready to sacrifice its truth and honor to its ambition, and that it has always been false, when falsehood would promote its views.

Sir, such considerations present themselves with great force to my mind; and no doubt, to the minds of those gentlemen who sit around me. With our views of the character and conduct of the French Government, little is wanting to convince us, that it is capable of everything treacherous, and all that is dishonorable. But, sir, these things ought to be said with caution by the friends of this Administration. They may criminate where they are seeking to justify.

Sir, when we are about to decide on the weight to be given to the testimony of any witness, we do not merely inquire into his general character. It is always considered important to ascertain what credit has been attached to him by the party implicated by his testimony. In estimating, therefore, the truth of the declaration of the Duke of Bassano, we are bound to ask in what light the official acts and declarations of the French Government have always been viewed and represented to the world by this Administration. I will not detain the House by dilating on the long, uniform course of implicit confidence reposed by it in the good faith of France, or the blind eagerness with which it has always seized and relied on the slightest engagements of that Government, and on the ample testimony which it has always borne by its acts and its declarations to the truth and honor of the French ruler. But, I will call the attention of the House to one instance in which these characteristics of our Administration were strikingly displayed.

I have already stated, that on the 5th of August, 1810, the Duke of Cadore, the French Minister of Foreign Affairs, declared to the American Minister at Paris, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan were revoked, and that they would cease to have effect on the 1st of November. This declaration was received by the Administration with eagerness. There was no hesitation, no delay, no inquiry into its nature or extent—no explanation demanded on the conditions, which on its face showed it to be deceptive and fraudulent. All was implicit, unbounded confidence, so unbounded, that the Executive issued his proclamation on the 2d of November, announcing as a fact, that these decrees were then repealed, and that they ceased to have effect the day previous. So unreservedly did the President rely on the truth of that declaration, that he did not hesitate to presume that the French Government would fully carry it into execution, and on that presumption, and on the confidence thus reposed in France, he founded the most important and eventful act of his Administration.

French Decrees.

H. OF R.

To have a full sense of the extent of that confidence, and of the strong and unhesitating evidence thus borne to the good faith of the French Government, it is necessary to consider the nature and effect of that proclamation. By the act of Congress, authorizing it in the event therein contemplated, the policy of this Government towards France and England assumed a definite shape. If France repealed her hostile edicts within the meaning of that act, it required little discernment to foresee that war with England would follow, in the event of a refusal on her part to repeal also. By that act this Government became pledged to that course, and the event has shown that the pledge was so understood.

In that state, then, of our relations with these Powers, the proclamation of the 2d of November may be considered as deciding the question of peace or war with England—if she refused to reposit the same blind confidence, as did our Administration, in the good faith of France. It was the decisive step—the passage of the Rubicon, which cut off the Administration from all retreat, without the exercise of more magnanimity and firmness than seems to have fallen to its lot.

If then, sir, this Administration was thus willing to stake the honor, and even the peace of the country, on the faith of the French Government, the world cannot have stronger evidence of the confidence reposed in that faith. If, on the simple declaration of a French Minister of Foreign Affairs, it was thus ready to overstep the last boundary between peace and war, and to enter on an untried course, the end of which no human foresight can discover, and the calamities of which no human power can estimate, surely it stands committed to the world, that such a declaration is at all times worthy of the most implicit belief.

Now, sir, permit me to remark that this declaration of the Duke of Cadore is entitled, in itself, to no more respect than is that of the Duke of Bassano, the probable truth or falsehood of which we are now considering—both declarations are attended with the same solemnity—both are official—both are made by Ministers standing in the same relation to the French Government—and to the truth of both is that Government equally pledged. If, then, the Administration have not hesitated to believe the one, it cannot complain if an impartial world would not hesitate to believe the other. Judging according to the common rules of evidence, and the plain dictates of common sense, the Administration in this case stands convicted by its own acts. After all it has done and said, an impeachment of the truth of the French Government does not lie in its mouth or the mouths of its friends.

But, sir, in investigating the truth of this declaration of the Duke of Bassano, if we advance a step further, we cannot fail to remark that it stands unexplained and uncontradicted. In private life, if a man will quietly submit to hear a charge deeply affecting his honor, without contradiction or resentment, in the judgment of all men he is self-condemned. Our Administration, more than a year since, heard the charge, which the declaration of the Duke of Bassano imputes to them, publicly and openly made, and yet it is not known to the world that they have thought it expedient to explain or contradict or even to resent it. This decree of the 28th of April, 1811, and the declaration of Bassano respecting it, have twice been distinctly brought within the notice of the Executive. In the Message to Congress at the commencement of the last session, in speaking of our relations with France, he tells us that our affairs retained the posture which they held at the date of his previous communication. "The only interesting occurrence," (says the Message) "meriting attention, is the promulgation of a French decree, purporting to be a definite repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees. This proceeding, although made the ground of the repeal of the British Orders in Council, is rendered, by the time and manner of it, liable to many objections." Again, in the communication made to this House, on the 3d of March last, not only the decree itself is given to the House, but the declaration of Bassano is distinctly noticed.

If the Executive had not felt the necessity of denying the truth of this declaration at the moment it first came to his knowledge—if he had considered (I will not say how erroneously) that such a denial, volunteered by this Government, would not have comported with its dignity—it is difficult to imagine why that denial, now considered on all sides so essential, was not made in his general Message to this House, when his allusion to that decree seemed naturally to invite it. It is still more difficult to imagine, why it was not made in his special Message of the 3d of March, when it was impliedly called for by this House. A silence thus guarded, on occasions so strongly demanding such a denial, impels us to believe that it could not have been made with truth.

Again, sir, in investigating the probable truth of this declaration, we should be led to inquire into the character of the Administration for a becoming spirit in resenting the insults of foreign Powers. Its friends, no doubt, are willing to consider that character as standing on high ground; and indeed if we recur to one instance, fresh in the recollection of the House, we must, it would seem, be satisfied that its sense of insult is extremely refined. It cannot be forgotten, that a British Minister was dismissed, and an important negotiation broken off, for what was justly termed "an insinuation of an insult"—an insult so very subtle in its nature, that this House for many days was engaged in profound and labored arguments to prove its existence. Surely then this Administration is fully alive to what is due to its own honor. And yet it has submitted in silence to the dishonorable imputation thrown upon it by the French Minister of Foreign Affairs. What shall we say then? If the declaration of the Duke of Bassano was true, it could not be resented. Are we then driven to believe it—or that this Administration, once so alive to the feelings of resentment against a British Minister, is dead to the insults of the Minister of France? Are we driven to believe it—or that this Administration has lost the sense of insult in the sense of fear?

Again, sir, in investigating the truth of this declaration, we should be led to inquire, on the supposition that this decree was concealed by our Administration—what motives could exist to have induced them to such an act? In speaking of the motives of any man, more especially of the men who administer the Government of the country, it becomes me to speak cautiously, though the nature of the case compels me to speak plainly.

There are those in this nation, sir, who think that they see sufficient inducements to this concealment, in the wish to gratify a long cherished hostility to England. They think that hostility to England has been the principle that has given life and growth and strength to the party now in power; and that the chiefs of that party duly estimate the importance of fostering that hostility, even at the sacrifice of peace. Others think that a sufficient motive for this concealment may be found in the equally long cherished wish to join in the anti-commercial war of France, to promote the views of the “grand pacificator” of Europe, who is to “conquer the liberty of the seas,” and who has told us that he “loves the Americans;” on these things, however, I will not stop to enlarge. But there are reasons for this concealment, which may have operated on the mind of the Executive, and which have their foundation in that pride of opinion and love of consistency, which are natural to man, and which often lead him to adhere obstinately to opinions once formed, in spite of the power of evidence and the light of truth.

The President, by his proclamation of the 2d of November, has declared to England and the world, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan were then revoked. To the fact of that revocation he thus pledged his own official character, and the character of his Government. To maintain the truth of that proclamation his feelings and pride became, of course, deeply enlisted. On its truth he had staked the peace and happiness of this country, and he no doubt felt all the responsibility which he had thus assumed. It is not surprising, therefore, that he should shut his eyes to the force of the evidence, which proved the precipitate rashness of that proclamation. When the decree of the 28th of April was communicated to him, he may have thought that the additional evidence afforded by it, of the repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, ought not to be desired by this nation, or by the British Government; and that the declaration of the Duke of Cadore in August, 1810, which had been so satisfactory to him, ought to be equally so to the world. The communication of that decree to the Government of Great Britain, or to the people of this country, he may therefore have deemed unimportant; and he may have considered such a communication as injurious to his reputation, as it would seem to imply a consciousness that, in issuing his proclamation, he had acted without all the evidence which he himself deemed material.

And, sir, to illustrate these remarks, and to show with what pertinacity the Executive has always adhered to the opinion that the declaration of the Duke of Cadore, in August, 1810, afforded satisfactory evidence of the repeal of the French decrees, permit me to turn your attention to the letter from the Secretary of State, to Mr. Russell, of the 21st of August, 1812. When, after the lapse of more than a year from its date, the decree of the 28th of April was transmitted from Paris to the British Government, and when upon that decree was founded the repeal of the Orders in Council, we find in the letter just alluded to, among the exceptions taken to that repeal, that the President is dissatisfied; “that it is founded exclusively on the French decree of the 28th of April, by which the repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, announced on the 5th of August, 1810, to take effect on the 1st of November of that year, at which time their operation actually ceased, is disregarded.” So determined was the Executive on adhering to his uniform construction of the declaration of the 5th of August, that he is dissatisfied that the British Government did not rest the repeal of their orders on that declaration, even at the moment when that declaration was incontestably proved, by France herself, to be false. I say incontestably proved by France herself to be false. For no man, after reading the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, can believe that the decrees of Berlin and Milan were unconditionally repealed on the 1st of November, 1810. Sir, the very act of making that decree, is in itself conclusive proof that no such previous unconditional repeal existed. If such an one did exist, that decree was unnecessary and absurd. But attend, sir, to the language of that decree: “Seeing by a law passed on the 2d of March, 1811, the Congress of the United States has ordered the execution of the provisions of the act of non-intercourse against Great Britain: Considering that the said law is an act of resistance to the arbitrary pretensions consecrated by the Orders in Council: We decree, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are definitively, and to date from the first day of November last, considered as not having existed in regard to American vessels.” Could any language more conclusively show, that no previous definitive repeal of these decrees existed? That, if there was any previous repeal at all, it was one depending on a condition precedent—the enforcement by the United States of the act of non-intercourse against England. This was done by the law of the 2d of March, 1811, and this law is expressly made the foundation of the definitive repeal of the decrees, while the law itself was founded on the fact, declared by the President's proclamation, that they were already definitively repealed.

French Decrees.

Thus it is, now, as clear as the light of day, that the proclamation of the President was rash and precipitate; that the fact on which it rested did not exist; that the declaration of the Duke of Cadore was false and deceptive; and that thus the calamitous war, in which we are now involved, has its very foundation in the duplicity and fraud of the French Government, and in the blind or wilful folly of our own.

But, sir, it has been urged with great warmth, by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, that, had there been no concealment of the decree of the 28th of April, had it been communicated to the British Government at the time it bears date, it would not have produced a repeal of the Orders in Council; and the gentleman refers us to the declaration of the Prince Regent of the 21st of April, 1812, and the subsequent correspondence between the Secretary of State and the British Minister in this country; by which he tells us, it will appear, that a repeal of the decrees of France, only as they related to the United States, would not have been satisfactory to that Government. Sir, admitting for the sake of the argument that the gentleman's construction of that declaration and correspondence is correct, it by no means supports the position he has taken. If the British Government has assumed at all the ground in relation to the French decrees, now asserted by the gentleman, it assumed it by the declaration of the 21st of April, 1812. For one year, then, after the date of the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, had Great Britain been requiring the definite evidence afforded by that decree, of the repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan—standing pledged on the receipt of that evidence to proceed, pari passu, in the repeal of the Orders in Council. Although, then, by the declaration of the 21st April, she may have assumed higher ground, can it be reasonably doubted, that if that decree had been communicated to her at the time it bears date, the Orders in Council would have been revoked? We cannot doubt about it, sir, when we know that, notwithstanding that declaration, she did repeal them in a manner "susceptible of explanations meeting the views of that Government" within a reasonable time after that decree was made known to her. I say within a reasonable time, for when we consider the unsettled state of the British Ministry at that period, the intervention of thirty days, between the receipt of the decree and the repeal of the orders, cannot be considered a material circumstance.

But, sir, we are told by the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, that the result of the inquiries, then going on in the House of Commons, as to the operation of the Orders in Council on the commerce and manufactures of Great Britain, was the true cause of their final repeal. But, sir, let it be remembered, that the object of those inquiries was not so much to ascertain whether the effect of the Orders in Council was injurious to the British nation; whether the extent of that injury was so great as to make it expedient to abandon them, notwithstanding France might still refuse to revoke her decrees. Great Britain must always have been sensible, that the effect of those orders was injurious to herself. The clamors of her manufacturing interest against them had been long as loud, and importunate, as they were at the period of their repeal. She wished only for a pretence to repeal them consistently with the ground she had uniformly taken with respect to the decrees of France. And I have little doubt that they would have been ultimately repealed without that pretence. The communication of the decree of April 28th, at the time it bears date, would have afforded the opportunity she had long wished; an opportunity which the event has shown her eager to improve. But, sir, it is again intimated, that the concealment of that decree was unimportant, for we are told, that although its promulgation might have produced the repeal of the Orders in Council, that repeal would not have prevented the war. The right claimed by Great Britain to impress her own seamen on board of our merchant vessels, it is now said, was in itself ample cause of war. Sir, I can never believe, that for this cause alone war would have been declared. Did not the Administration, at a late period, profess its readiness to overlook the question of impressment, and to give up its whole restrictive system against England, on an arrangement of the other matters of difference between the two Governments? If we go back to the negotiation with Mr. Erskine; if we consider the eagerness with which that negotiation was conducted, and the rapidity with which it was hurried through all the forms of diplomacy; and if we consider, also, that in the arrangement made with that Minister, the question of impressment was untouched, we must be convinced that the Administration considered it a point of minor importance.

It is not reasonable to expect on this subject that any proof can be drawn from the formal declarations of the Government. But even here we may discover something which may serve to show in what light a repeal of the Orders in Council before the declaration of war would have been viewed. In the letter before alluded to, of the 21st of August, 1812, from the Secretary of State to Mr. Russell, we are told, that "it is not now a question whether the declaration of the Prince Regent (repealing the Orders in Council) is such as ought to have produced a repeal of the non-importation act, had war not been declared, because, by the declaration of war, that question was superseded." A ground is thus afforded for a fair inference, that the Administration felt itself precluded by the declaration of war from giving to the repeal of the Orders in Council that effect and influence on the policy of this country, to which it might otherwise have been entitled.

But, sir, independent of all evidence on this subject to be drawn from the acts or declarations of the Government, I may venture to appeal to honorable gentlemen who were members of this House at the time war was declared, and to ask them whether such a declaration would or could have been made, had it not been for the conviction which the majority then professed to feel, that the Orders in Council would not be revoked? I may appeal to the general sense and understanding of the nation on this head, and to the universal expression of regret, when it was found that these orders were in fact revoked about the time war was declared; that that declaration had not been delayed. Sir, I can be convinced of nothing more firmly than that the sober sense of this House, or of this people, would never have sanctioned a declaration of war on the ground alone of the British claim to impress their own seamen.

I have thus, Mr. Speaker, endeavored to state to the House the reasons which have induced me to think that the promulgation of the decree of April 28th, at the time of its date, was highly important to the best interests of this country. You will have perceived, sir, that my remarks have been founded on the supposition, that that decree was in truth made by the French Government at the time it bears date, and that it has been suppressed by that Government, or our own, or by both in concert. I have also ventured to state to the House the considerations which operate powerfully to convince us that the declaration of the Duke of Bassano, charging the suppression exclusively on the Government of this country, is true. And really, sir, when we consider that this declaration is the solemn official act of the French Government; of a Government to whose acts and declarations this Administration has always declared that the most unbounded confidence was due; that it is a declaration as yet unexplained and uncontradicted, and that, for the act it imputes to the Administration, adequate motives may be assigned, the mind must struggle hard to resist the conviction pressed upon it by such a weight of evidence.

Viewing the subject in this point of light; considering that as the facts now stand before the public, this Administration must be convicted of having suppressed an important public document for the worst of purposes, I must be permitted, in common with my eloquent friend from Maryland, (Mr. HANSON,) to express my surprise that the resolutions now on the table, should be opposed. These resolutions are designed to throw light on this dark transaction. If it will bear the light, the friends of the Administration ought to promote the inquiry. They ought not to shrink from a measure which must result in the vindication of its honor, if indeed it can be vindicated. We now tender to the majority an opportunity, which they ought themselves to have taken, of repelling this foul slander on our Government. We would fain hope that the effect of this investigation will be to wipe away the suspicion which is now attached to our rulers—a suspicion which is daily gathering strength, and which will soon become conviction, if you reject these resolutions. The nation ought not, and will not be satisfied without this inquiry. The public voice imperiously demands it. Now when the pressure of the war begins to be felt; when you are about to impose heavy burdens on the people for its support, at least let them know that if you have been the dupes, you have not been the willing dupes of the intrigues and falsehood of France. You accuse us of thwarting the measures and views of the Administration by our opposition to the war. If you know your own interest, take from us the most deadly weapon that can be wielded against you. Be prompt in repelling the charge that you have been tricked and betrayed into this war by France, and that you have not dared to remonstrate. Let the Administration tell us where the falsehood lies, and if they are innocent, let us know how they repelled the vile calumny. Let us see that they have had spirit enough to resent an imposition which they had discernment enough to detect.

Sir, these are considerations which I urge to gentlemen who sit on the other side of the House. To me, had I a seat there, they would be conclusive. But, sir, I confess I have much higher motives; motives which, I have no doubt, operated strongly on the mind of my friend from New Hampshire, when he determined to call the attention of the House to this subject. My political observation, limited as it has been, has taught me that many of the worst evils under which this country has suffered have arisen from that overweening confidence in French faith and honor, which is felt not only by the men who administer the Government, but by a portion of the people. It is this confidence that has bound and hoodwinked every victim which has been sacrificed by France. I confess, sir, I wish this delusion in the public mind corrected. I wish to see this Administration compelled to stamp on the forehead of France, the falsehood she has dared to utter, that it may remain there as a mark to warn the nations, that there is no safety but in her open and avowed enmity. And sir, if, contrary to our hopes, the Administration have been a willing party to this dark intrigue; if they have connived at the falsehood of the French Government, and have not dared to repel the grossest insult which could be offered to the independence and honor of our country, I equally wish to see the mask stripped from the faces of men, who will then be acknowledged to have too long deceived an honorable and confiding people.

Mr. GROSVENOR addressed the Chair as follows: Mr. Speaker, I cannot suffer the question to be taken without offering to the House my reasons for supporting the resolution. In doing this, sir, I, like the honorable gentleman from South Carolina, may become warm; yet as I can never admit that such warmth furnishes any license to him for personal attack, or improper language, so I shall claim no such license myself, by condescending to imitate his example. I have, Mr. Speaker, adverted to the example of the honorable gentleman, for the purpose of informing him that the boisterous language on this floor by way of defiance, threat, or intimidation, will no longer have its wonted effect.

French Decrees.

I wish that honorable gentleman and every other gentleman on this floor distinctly to understand, that their threats have no terror for us. They pass by us like the idle winds which we respect not. Sir, I stand here the independent representative of a free people. Upon all topics which come before this House, I shall ever "speak what I do think," restrained by nothing but the rules of decorum which are here established, and which it may become every gentleman to observe.

I stand upon my own personal right, which I will yield to no man. I stand upon the freehold of the Constitution, from which I will not be driven without a struggle.

Sir, I have no doubt that this House has a perfect right to the information demanded by the resolutions. How can we speak or act upon subjects inseparably connected with our foreign relations, if the Executive, the only organ of communication with other nations, may be suffered at his sovereign will and pleasure to withhold from us all his correspondence? By admitting such a course of practice, the President has had the destinies of this nation in his hands—nor is it strange that this House, that Congress and the nation, have been hurried from one restrictive measure to another, and finally into an unnecessary and a wanton war. Sir, I have not the slightest doubt that to this constant habit of Executive secrecy, to the garbled extracts of letters from and to the French Government, which deform our journals and deceive the public; to the deep darkness which shrouds our intercourse with the arch tyrant; more than to any other cause, may be imputed all our present dangers and calamities. Let this House, let this country, no longer be forced to feel its way in thick darkness when the light and the day are within its reach.

In England, it is true "His Majesty can do no wrong"—and when his Ministry draw a veil over their conduct, they step boldly forth and demand the confidence of the Parliament and the country, secure in the protection of the King and the majority. But, sir, I am utterly astonished when I find gentlemen who bluster much about the purity of their republicanism, who are in an absolute political fever when the theory or practice of that "corrupt, despotic, and treacherous" nation is even hinted at, should now wish to introduce here a practice precisely similar. The foundation of our whole system of Government is responsibility. The President and most of his dependents are by the Constitution obnoxious to the animadversions of this House. And every official man in the Republic is responsible to the people. Let this responsibility never be destroyed or evaded by suffering any officer, be he high or be he low, to draw a permanent veil over his official conduct; and, if he attempts it, let this House, planting itself upon the Constitution, raise its arm, tear asunder the pernicious covering, and expose the naked truth to the view of the people. In the pure age of our Republic such was the theory and the practice under our Constitution.

But it is said that no reason is assigned in the resolutions for the call, no purpose designated for which the information is required.

Sir, I had considered that this objection was settled forever in the session of 1796. The President then refused the information demanded by the House. Upon this refusal the House passed two resolutions, the one of which I will read:

"Resolved, That it is not necessary to the propriety of any application from this House to the Executive for information desired by them, and which may relate to any Constitutional functions of the House, that the purposes for which such information may be wanted, or to which the same may be applied, should be stated in the application."

On the passage of this resolution, Mr. Madison and Mr. Gallatin, then members of this House, both spoke and voted in the affirmative. Can the Executive shrink from the rule which he when on this floor adopted? Or will his supporters here deal to him a measure different from that which he dealt to the Father of his Country? The principle on which this resolution is founded, has prevailed here to this day; and strange indeed would it be, if now it should be violated, to shield from its fair operation the very man who originated and established it among us.

Another objection has been started. It seems that the resolutions are too categorical and particular. Sir, I do admit that the resolutions are strongly marked with a particular, categorical, and even inquisitorial character. From them no casuistry, no art, can enable the President to escape. They were thus drawn for no other reason than to preclude all evasion and elusion—to obtain the particular and precise information demanded. I well know, that the ordinary general form is more proper and more respectful. But, sir, there may be cases in which mere form must yield to substance and necessity, courtly respect to plain Republican sincerity. Is not this precisely such a case?

At the close of the last session, upon the motion of the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH,) a resolution was adopted in the ordinary and general form—

"Resolved, That the President be requested to cause to be laid before the House the French decree, purporting to be a repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, referred to in his Message of the 4th of November last, together with such information as he may possess concerning the time and manner of promulgating the same," &c. &c.

This is the material part of the resolution. What was the reply to this resolution? A simple communication of the degrading accusation of the French Minister, and that only. Not one word of denial or of comment; not a murmur of resentment at the foul stigma which the Duke of Bassano had attempted to fix on the honor of the Executive and the character of the country. All information that the President "might possess relative to the time and manner of promulgating" the decree was refused or evaded; and thereby the blot on our national honor was rendered tenfold deeper and blacker.

H. OF R.

French Decrees.

JUNE, 1813.

Would these honorable gentlemen have us repeat an experiment which issued in such consequences? Would they again adopt a course which would again disappoint us and disgrace our country? No, sir, if this information ought to be obtained, this is the only form, the only manner to obtain it. We must tell the Executive without ambiguity and with precision, and yet with every respect compatible with our duty, our objects and our requests. If these resolutions pass, they must be met with satisfactory information, or with a refusal to communicate. The reply will rest with the President, and upon him be the responsibility for the form and substance of that reply.

Having disposed of the form of these resolutions, I will now proceed to their substance.

An instrument purporting to be a French decree, modifying or repealing the French Berlin and Milan decrees, so far as they violated our neutral rights, was communicated by the Duke of Bassano to Mr. Barlow, our Minister in France, on the 10th of May, 1812. This decree bears date the 24th of April, 1811. It had been concealed for more than one year from the time of its date. Mr. Barlow, conscious that the publication of the decree, at its date, would have saved this country from many evils, and astonished at its concealment, demanded of the Duke of Bassano whether it had ever been published. The Duke replied, that it had been communicated to our Minister in France, and sent on to Mr. Serurier, to be communicated to our Government. If the Duke of Bassano stated the fact correctly, then our Government was guilty of concealing the decree. If he stated a falsehood, then his own Government is guilty of the concealment, with the full addition of duplicity and falsehood. Certainly, the charge of the French Minister implicated the honor and the honesty of the Executive of this country. It struck a blow at the integrity and honor of the Government. Yet the Executive has never publicly denied the foul accusation. It is to arrive at truth in relation to this dark and alarming transaction, to acquit the innocent, and to hang the guilty up a detestable spectacle to the universe, that these resolutions are offered. Let me ask the House, let me ask the nation, is not the object laudable—is not the duty important and imperious?

Mr. Speaker, I have not one doubt that, if that decree had been published at the time of its date, it would have prevented the present war and all its calamitous consequences. To establish this position, I must solicit the attention of the House to the facts and events which conducted this devoted nation to its present disastrous situation. After unsuccessfully negotiating for the repeal of the French decrees and British orders—after a wild and destructive experiment had evinced that the embargo, a measure founded in the grossest political error, continued in obstinacy, and ending in national disgrace and commercial ruin, was equally imbecile abroad and pernicious at home—the Government, either shrinking from the frowning aspect of the North, or resolving to establish an impartial policy between the two belligerents, assumed what was then called its final neutral attitude.

The Committee of Foreign Relations of this House, under the immediate influence of the direction of the present Executive, on the 22d of November, 1808, made a report, in which was described the situation of the country in relation to France and England, the ground which the Administration were about to occupy distinctly pointed out, and the principles of justice and policy which would influence its conduct towards those nations fully developed. I beg the attention of the House to a few passages in that report.

The framers of the report first describe the origin and foundation of the French decrees and British orders, the manner in which they violate American rights, the policy of the embargo, and the efforts made by the American Government to obtain a revocation of those decrees and orders. They then say, "The effort has been ineffectual. The propositions have been actually rejected by one of the belligerent Powers and remain unanswered by the other. In that state of things, what course ought the United States to pursue? Your committee can perceive no other alternative but abject and degrading submission, war with both nations, or a continuance and enforcement of the present suspension of commerce."

They reject the first alternative, and then proceed: "There is no other alternative but war with both nations, or a continuance of the present system; for, war with one of the belligerents would be submission to the edicts and will of the other." "Nor can it be doubted, that a measure that would supply exclusively one of the belligerents, would be war with the other." While the decrees of both nations remain unrepealed, the committee here distinctly state, that any "restrictive measures that would exclusively supply one of the belligerents, whether of non-intercourse or non-importation against the one nation, would be, ipso facto, war with that nation, and submission to the edicts and will of the other."

They then consider the question of war, and say: "The present unsettled state of the world, the extraordinary situation in which the United States are placed, and the necessity, if war be resorted to, of making it, at the same time, against both nations, and these the two most powerful in the world, are the principal causes of hesitation. There would be none in resorting to the remedy, however calamitous, if a selection could be made on any principle of justice, or without a sacrifice of national independence." Language cannot be plainer. The committee, acting, I repeat, under the entire control and direction of the Executive, distinctly state, that war with either nation, whether by the new fashioned mode of commercial restrictions, or by the old fashioned mode of fighting, while the decrees of both nations were in force, would be dishonor, injustice, submission, and a sacrifice of national independence, and in direct contradiction to the idea advanced yesterday by the gentleman from South Carolina. In such circumstances, neither nation could be, with honor and justice, selected for hostility.

Mr. Speaker, this report, and all its principles, emanating directly from the Executive, were adopted by this House, and by Congress. The Government of the United States thereby pledged their honor, their character, and their faith to our merchants, to our people, to the belligerent nations, and to the world, to be governed in their future policy by its provisions, and they never violated that pledge until the President of the United States issued his inconsiderate—his false proclamation, on the 2d day of November, 1810. Soon after this report and its principles were adopted in this House, the embargo descended to the grave. I hope, never again to rear its "miscreated front" among us. In pursuance of the principles of the report, on the 1st of March, 1809, an act, commonly called the non-intercourse law, was passed, to commence on the succeeding 20th of May, against both belligerents, but in strict accordance with the new and impartial policy of our Government, containing a provision that, if France or England should so far repeal or modify her edicts, as that they should cease to violate our neutral rights, the fact should be proclaimed by the President, and the act was to cease as to that nation.

This act was to expire with the next session of Congress. I pass over the arrangement of the British Minister, Erskine, the proclamation of the President founded thereon, the rescinding of that proclamation, the outrageous conduct of France upon the pretence of retaliation for that act, the vile insults heaped upon our Government by France, and borne with a patience bordering on pusillanimity, and request your attention to the act of the 1st of May, 1810. This act was founded on the principles of the report; it was passed just before the expiration of the act of non-intercourse, and was intended to supply its place. It declared that, if Great Britain or France should so revoke or modify her edicts as that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, which fact the President should declare by proclamation; and, if the other nation should not, within three months thereafter, revoke or modify her edicts in like manner, then certain sections of the non-intercourse law of March, 1809, should be revived against the nation so refusing to revoke or modify. The sections, thus to be revived, constituted an iron system of non-importation against such nation.

Mr. Speaker, from this act this country may date the origin of those sinister events, which now cover her with distress and blood. This is the Pandora's box, whence have escaped all that swarm of disasters which that nation will long remember with tears of blood. It placed the fate of this country, its peace, its prosperity, its happiness, in the hands of men unable to guard and protect them. The Constitutional guardians of the people, the immediate sentinels of our honor and independence, shrinking or flying from their posts, surrendered their power, to be exercised by an Executive. What a wild field of Gallic intrigue was now presented! The imperial magician had now only to seduce or to dupe the Executive, and this proud nation would lay prostrate, in the snares of French perfidy and violence. A "gordian knot" would be fastened upon us, and this last Republic be found fighting in the universal battle, side by side, with the veriest tyrant that ever crimsoned the earth with blood.

From the moment that this law was known in France, the work of duplicity began, and it never ceased until all the designs of the French despot were fully accomplished. By the principles of the report, adopted by Congress; by the avowed and permanent policy of the Government; by the non-intercourse law of 1809; by every consideration of "justice, national honor, and national independence," and finally by the express provision of the law of May, 1810, on which only he could act, the President was solemnly bound never to issue his proclamation, until the French Government should have, in good faith, repealed or modified her decrees, in relation to American commerce. How was the fact? The President waited for no such repeal or modification. He became the dupe of French duplicity and falsehood. In the language of Mr. Russell, then our Minister in France, the President "was shuffled into the lead where national honor and the law required him to follow."

For the indubitable correctness of these propositions I appeal to facts. On the 5th of August, 1810, the Duke de Cadore, the French Minister of Foreign Relations, addressed a note to Mr. Armstrong, then our Minister in France, from which I will read an extract: "I am authorized to declare to you, sir, that the decrees of Berlin and Milan are revoked, and that after the 1st of November they will cease to have effect; it being well understood that, in consequence of this declaration, the English shall revoke their Orders in Council, and renounce the new principles of blockade, which they have wished to establish, or that the United States, conformably to the act you have just communicated, shall cause their rights to be respected by the English."

Sir, this is the instrument, and the only instrument, upon which the proclamation of the President was founded. Upon perusing this letter, its hollow, juggling, jesuitical character is visible and glaring. Unconnected with subsequent events, which stripped it of all ambiguity, from its very terms, who will dare to say that it revoked or modified the decrees, as required by the act of May preceding? It does not even purport to do this; it has not even the merit of Pythian obscurity; it ought not to have deceived the weakest understanding. "It being well understood," that is, "upon condition," (not in consequence of this revocation, even the juggler himself had not the impudence to call it a revocation,) "the English shall revoke, &c., or America cause her rights to be respected." What is the plain English of this jesuitical instrument? "Upon condition that England revokes her decrees, or that America, in case she does not so revoke, proclaims a measure of non-importation against her exclusively, then I make this declaration, that my decrees shall be revoked on the 1st November."

H. OF R.

French Decrees.

This is the plain import of this famous letter. It demanded that the Executive should "take the lead where national honor and the law required him to follow." It demanded, as a condition precedent to the absolute revocation of the French decree, that the President, under the law of May, 1810, should proclaim a non-importation act against England—a measure which, under such circumstances, the committee of this House, in 1808, had pronounced to be a "measure of war."

What was the plain duty of the President? Surely to resist the demand—at least, to wait until time, and the conduct of France, should strip the "declaration" of its oracular ambiguity. On the contrary, the President, as if eager to bind his country in the toils; as if eager to violate the honor of the nation and the law, as soon as it was possible, issued a proclamation, in which he declared the French decrees revoked or modified; in which he demanded from Britain a revocation of her Orders in Council, and in which he announced the act of non-importation against her, if she failed to comply with the demand by the second day of the February succeeding.

Never, sir, I venture to say, never was public astonishment greater than upon the 2d November, when this proclamation was published.

And let me solemnly demand, have not subsequent events demonstrated that, at the time, and long after the date of this proclamation, the Berlin and Milan decrees were in full force against America? I will briefly examine the matter, and the American people, even that party which has nailed its colors to the mast of the Executive, and resolved, with him, to go to the bottom, shall no longer doubt the weakness of the President, and the black treachery of his imperial deceiver.

Mr Speaker: After the first of November, after the official proclamation of the President had, in the face of the world, pronounced the Berlin and Milan decrees repealed or modified so as no longer to violate the neutral commerce of America, American vessels were captured on the sea, and seized in France under these very decrees, were prosecuted under these very decrees, and never released from the grasp of these decrees, until late in the year 1811; and even then, not released by virtue of the Duke of Cadore's pretended letter of repeal, but in consequence of special orders of the Emperor, founded on the act of March, 1811, which confirmed the proclamation of the President, and established a non-importation act against England. If this proposition be true, all doubt is at an end. For folly or prejudice itself cannot believe that these vessels were seized and held nearly a year under decrees which were not in existence. They cannot believe that the courts of France could act upon and enforce laws which, a year before, had been repealed and extinguished by the Government. I will read to the House one case, selected as a fair specimen of numerous others. It is the case of the New Orleans Packet, detailed in a letter from Mr. Russell to the Secretary of State, dated the 9th of June, 1811. That vessel arrived in France on the 3d of December, more than a month after the proclamation of the President had been issued. Mr. Russell states that, "on the 5th of December, the director of the customs at Bordeaux seized her and her cargo under the Milan decrees of the 23d of November and 17th of December, 1807, expressly set forth, for having come from an English port, and for having been visited by an English vessel of war." The proclamation of the President arrived in France, and was received by Mr. Russell, on the 13th of the same month. He had, on the 10th, presented a remonstrance against the proceeding, and kept back the proclamation. For what purpose did he thus act? To test the question, he says, whether the French decrees were in truth revoked. To have used the proclamation, he says, "would be nothing better than absurdly and basely employing the declaration of the President, that the Berlin and Milan decrees had been revoked, as the means of obtaining their revocation." He therefore kept it back to ascertain "whether the American Government had been shuffled into the lead where national honor and the law required it to follow." He did keep back the proclamation, and the question was decided; his remonstrance was disregarded. For, he says, "that the procès verbal, issued after his remonstrance was presented, expressly declares that the confiscation of this property was to be pursued before the Imperial Council of Prizes at Paris, according to the decrees of the 23d of November and the 17th of December, 1807, or, in other words, the decrees of Milan."

His remonstrances having effected nothing, Mr. Russell did proceed, "absurdly and basely," to use the proclamation. He communicated it to the French Government on the 17th of the same month, and he says, from this very 17th of December, "all further proceedings against the New Orleans Packet were suspended."

These are the facts, and what is the inference of this honest and independent Minister? "It appears, therefore, that the remonstrance of the 10th of December, arrested the proceedings complained of," &c.

Now, sir, it appears to me, that a more barefaced perversion of facts was never attempted by any Minister. The remonstrance produced no effect whatever. Until the 17th, when the proclamation was presented, the vessel "was vigorously prosecuted." From that moment, "all further proceedings against the New Orleans Packet were suspended." That instrument alone arrested "the proceedings complained of," not only against the New Orleans Packet, but all other vessels which had been captured after the first of November. This is demonstrated by an order issued by the French Government to the President of the Council of Prizes, on the 25th of December, exactly eight days after the proclamation had been communicated by Mr. Russell. Suffer me to read an extract from that order:

"In consequence of this engagement entered into by the Government of the United States, to cause their rights to be respected, His Majesty orders that all the causes that may be pending in the Council of Prizes, of captures of American vessels, made after the 1st of November, and those that may in future be brought before it, shall not be judged according to the principles of the decrees of Berlin and Milan; but that they shall remain suspended; the vessels captured and seized to remain only in a state of sequestration, until the 2d of February next, the period at which the United States having fulfilled the engagement to cause their rights to be respected, the said captures shall be declared null by the Council, and the American vessels restored, together with their cargoes, to the proprietors."

No language can add to the force of this extract; it recognises the Berlin and Milan decrees as existing against America. In consequence of the "engagement," contained in the proclamation, it suspends all proceedings against our vessels, and says, when that "engagement" shall be "fulfilled" the vessels shall be restored. That engagement was fulfilled by the law of the 2d of March, 1811, which, I have already stated, confirmed the proclamation of the President, and established a non-importation act against England.

On the 28th of April, 1811, the French tyrant issued his impending decree—I will read it to the House:

PALACE OF ST. CLOUD,
April 28, 1811.

Napoleon, Emperor of the French, &c. On the report of our Minister of Foreign Relations:

Seeing, by a law passed on the 2d of March, 1811, the Congress of the United States has ordered the execution of the provisions of the act of non-intercourse, which prohibits the vessels and merchandise of Great Britain, her colonies, and dependencies, from entering into the ports of the United States:

Considering that the said law is an act of resistance to the arbitrary pretensions consecrated by the British Orders in Council, and a formal refusal to adhere to a system invading the independence of neutral Powers and of their flag, we have ordered and decreed, as follows:

The decrees of Berlin and Milan are definitively, and to date from the 1st of November last, considered as not existing in regard to American vessels.

NAPOLÉON.

By the Emperor: The Minister Secretary of State,
THE COUNT DARU.

This decree is in perfect conformity to every act and proceeding of the French Government. It fulfilled the promise made by the Duke de Cadore, in his letter of the 8th of August. America, by the proclamation and by the law of March, 1811, had resisted England, and virtually declared war against her; she had fulfilled the conditions presented in that letter; in consideration of which the repealing decree of France was issued. Whether that decree was issued at the time it bears date, or whether by collusion with Mr. Barlow it was antedated, is of no importance; in either case it exhibits the true meaning of all the acts of France which preceded it. It proves the falsity of the President's proclamation, the fatal law of March, and demonstrates that the American President was the dupe of the tyrant, that "he was shuffled into the lead where national honor and the law required that he should follow."

I have said, if the French repealing decree had been made known to the Congress, to the American people, and to England, in the Spring of 1811, it would have prevented the present disastrous war. Permit me now to prove it. From the date of the President's proclamation down to the very declaration of war, our Government took the ground that the French decrees were in truth repealed, by the letter of the Duke de Cadore, on the 5th of August preceding; and upon this basis demanded the revocation of the British Orders in Council. Britain, denying that Cadore's letter was any repeal or modification, demanded the instrument of repeal issued by the Emperor, as the only ground on which she would revoke her orders. Neither the French or the American Government pretended that any such instrument was in existence; but the latter Government, deceived by the arts of the arch juggler, assumed the fact, and founded thereon hostile proceedings against England. If the decree had been published it would have been impossible that the vile deception could longer have been cherished by either Government, and Congress would have been forced by very shame to have retraced their steps, to have rescinded the proclamation, to have repealed the law of March, and to have placed the country on the same ground which she occupied in May, 1810. A war with England could not then have followed; unless, indeed, the Administration had been prepared openly to abandon all those principles of "national honor, national independence, national justice," and national policy, which they had adopted in the session of 1808.

Yes, sir, even though the British orders had remained unrepealed and unmodified, the publication of that decree would have cut the "Gordian knot," released this country from the toils of the tyrant, and have averted, perhaps for ever, this unnatural war. But suppose in this I am mistaken, yet have we not every reason to believe that if the French repealing decree had been known to England, she would have modified her Orders in Council, and continued peace would have been the consequence. Surely it is preposterous to pretend, if those orders had been revoked, that yet war would have been declared. The very reverse is proved by all the acts of our Government. In the Message of the President, at the commencement of the war-session of Congress, the "Orders in Council" are the burden of the complaint—impressment is not even mentioned. In all the correspondence between the two Governments, which preceded the war, the "Orders in Council" constitute the great topic of discussion.

In the correspondence which commenced between Mr. Foster and Mr. Monroe, on the 30th of May, 1812, and continued almost daily, down to the very declaration of war, the repeal of the Orders in Council was the only subject of discussion—and that alone was demanded, as a sine qua non to a restoration of a friendly intercourse. Impressment, though always a subject of difference between the two nations, had never been by our Government for a moment considered as a sufficient cause of war. Hence, in the arrangement with the British Minister, Erskine, not a word is said, not a stipulation made on that subject. Hence, in all the correspondence which immediately preceded the war, the subject of impressment is rarely if ever mentioned; and hence, in this House and the Senate, the act declaring war passed upon the sole but delusive ground that France had modified or repealed her decrees, and that England had refused to revoke or modify her Orders. Let me appeal to the members of this House who voted for the war. Would they have dared to have done that deed upon the subject of impressment alone? I am sure they would not—I speak not from personal knowledge—I speak from all that preceded, that accompanied, and that followed that dreadful measure. The subject of impressment was never swelled into that hideous form it now wears; it never became “a dog of war,” until when the Orders in Council were revoked, and an armistice demanded by England, it was dragged forward to repel the demand and to justify the Administration for “wading deeper and deeper in blood.” But let gentlemen on this floor answer what they will of this, I am certain the people of this country would never have joined in the quixotic expedition. The cant of “free trade and sailors’ rights,” heard only in the woods of the West where no trade exists, and no sailors are to be found, could not have drowned the voice of commerce, of agriculture, of justice, and of peace. Let gentlemen on this floor answer what they may, I tell them, they could not, they durst not have plunged this nation into war if the British Orders in Council had been repealed or modified. But those orders would have been repealed or modified if the French decree had not been concealed.

On this subject no doubt can exist. And never was I more astonished than when I yesterday heard the honorable gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) deny this position. Upon what grounds does he place this denial? First, upon the letters of Mr. Foster to Mr. Monroe, which preceded the war. Sir, that correspondence I have perused, and a more singular, equivocal, weak, and indistinct correspondence I have never seen. It is undeniable, that in some paragraphs of Foster’s letters, abstracted from the residue, something like the position of the honorable gentleman may be found. But even these, abstracted from the rest, are declared by Mr. Monroe himself to be equivocal. The whole correspondence clearly proves that Mr. Foster never intended to declare, and never did definitively declare, that if an authentic instrument repealing the French decrees, so far as they violated the neutral commerce of America, should be produced, England would not revoke her orders in a similar manner. On the contrary, he throughout disputed even the partial repeal of the French decrees; and says the question whether England would revoke as to America, was premature, and could be discussed to no purpose until America should produce an authentic instrument of repeal.

In the last letter which he wrote to Mr. Monroe, only four days before the final passage of the act declaring war, he avers that his preceding letters had been misunderstood and misconstrued, and finally declares—“I will now say, that I feel entirely authorized to assure you, that if you can at any time produce a full and unconditional repeal of the French decrees, as you have a right to demand it in your character of a neutral nation, and that it be disengaged from any connexion with the question concerning our maritime rights, we shall be ready to meet you with a revocation of the Orders in Council.”

However, then, in the course of Mr. Foster’s letters, some paragraphs may be selected, which, unconnected with what preceded and followed, might prove the position of the honorable gentleman. It is clear to me, that, when viewed as a whole, they neither prove or support it. I might demonstrate this by wading paragraph by paragraph through the whole correspondence. But this I shall omit, both because the honorable gentleman from South Carolina has placed but little reliance upon the letters of Mr. Foster, and because, in truth and in fact, they have but little bearing upon the question? What is the question? If the French repealing decree of April 1811 had been made known to England at its date, would she have revoked her orders as related to America? Mr. Foster’s letters can weigh but little, because, at the very time they were writing, that decree was before the English Government, and that Government was then deciding the very question. Of course, and most certainly, we are not to look to the letters of Mr. Foster to decide the question, but to the acts of the Government itself. The gentleman from South Carolina, aware of this, has resorted to an act of Government—to the declaration of the Prince Regent, issued the 21st of April, 1812. On that paper he has planted himself. With a violence, and in a manner but little becoming his situation on this floor, and in language both improper and indecorous, he has avowed, that in that paper is contained an express avowal, that “although France should repeal or modify her decrees, so as that they should cease to violate our neutral commerce, the English Government would not repeal or modify its orders in the same manner.”

[Here Mr. BING—then in the Chair—called Mr. G. to order. He said it was disorderly to apply the epithet “indecorous,” to any gentleman on that floor. Mr. CALHOUN then rose and said, he should say nothing then, but would reply to Mr. G.]

Mr. G.—I have, in my opinion, described the “language” of the honorable gentleman correctly. I have said no more than I understood the honorable gentleman to admit in his explanation when called to order by a gentleman from New

French Decrees.

H. OF R.

Jersey (Mr. Stockton)—but I bow to the admonition of the Chair.

The honorable gentleman proceeded to affirm that, thereafter, no gentleman on this floor should "dare" to assert the contrary of his position. And he declared that he would prove the man guilty of "falsehood" who should make such an assertion. Sir, he has thus boldly thrown the gauntlet of defiance—I enter the lists and take it up—I do assert that the declaration of the Prince Regent contains no such avowal.

Thus, sir, there is a precise issue between that honorable gentleman and myself—I shall patiently await the execution of his threatenings.

That declaration is founded on an official report to the French Senate, republishing, in the broadest terms, the Berlin and Milan decrees as permanent laws of the Empire. It expressly denies any partial repeal in favor of America to have been made by France. It states the condition on which the Orders in Council will be revoked, not partially, not in favor of America alone, but in favor of all the world. And states those conditions to be the "express and unconditional repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, by some authentic instrument of the British Government." But in no part of it is there an intimation either that the British Government will, or will not, revoke or modify its orders as to America alone, in case France shall have repealed or modified her decrees in favor of America alone. Such a case is not touched upon, or alluded to, in the declaration. The gentleman from South Carolina must, therefore, abandon his position. He cannot sustain it by any effort of violence or sophistry.

But, sir, I, in my turn, will put "this question at rest forever." I will not say what the gentleman from South Carolina "dare do." I will not condescend to imitate his example of violence and threatening. But I will indulge the belief that neither he, or any other gentleman, shall have one honest doubt remaining. The Government of England did, immediately upon receiving the French decree, and in consequence of that very decree, revoke their Orders in Council, so far as they violated the neutral commerce of America.

Does not this fact speak in the language of demonstration to the judgment of any man who hears me? If in the Spring of 1812 the publication of the French decrees did produce the revocation of the orders, would not the publication of the same decree have produced a like revocation in the Spring of 1811? No man of sane mind and ordinary capacity can doubt it.

But the honorable gentleman has said—even in June, 1812, it was not the publication of the French decree, but the clamors of English merchants and mechanics, which produced the revocation. And this he infers from the fact that the French decree was in possession of the English Government for thirty-three days, during all which time the House of Commons were discussing the merits of the Orders in Council, before those orders were revoked.

To the utter confusion of this fanciful hypothesis, I will read an extract from the English order of revocation. The order bears date the 23d of June 1812.

"And whereas the Chargé des Affaires of the United States of America, resident at this Court did, on the 20th day of May last, transmit to Lord Viscount Castlereagh, one of His Majesty's principal Secretaries of State, a copy of a certain instrument then for the first time communicated to this Court, purporting to be a decree passed by the Government of France on the 28th day of April, by which the decrees of Berlin and Milan are declared to be definitively no longer in force in regard to American vessels."

He then states, that although "the tenor of said instrument" does not satisfy the conditions of his former declaration, yet wishing to re-establish the intercourse between neutral and belligerent nations, he, "therefore, is pleased" to revoke his orders, as they relate to American vessels and property.

The Prince Regent does here expressly aver, that the conjectures of the honorable gentleman are visionary.

He does declare that this revocation is founded on the French repealing decree. But this cannot be true, says the honorable gentleman, because the Prince Regent received the French repealing decree on the 20th of May, and delayed his revocation until the 23d of June. A few facts will dispose of this captious objection.

Mr. Perceval, the Prime Minister of England, was assassinated on the 10th of May. The Ministry was at once substantially dissolved. The gentleman cannot have forgotten the ministerial interregnum which ensued, and which continued for more than one month. He cannot have forgotten the various negotiations of Castlereagh and Liverpool, of Canning and of Wellesley, of Erskine, of Gray, of Grenville, and finally, of Moira. Nor can he but remember, that no Ministry was established until after the 14th of June. Is not that gentleman aware that without a responsible Ministry, the constitution of England does not recognise any act of its Government as legal and valid. He must know that instantly upon the full re-establishment of the Ministry, the subject was decided, and the Orders in Council revoked.

Nor had "the inquiries in the House of Commons or the pressure of the people" any decisive effect in producing that revocation. That pressure had long been felt by the people and long known to the English Government; the loud clamors of the people had long been heard without the slightest effect. Nor did the inquiry by the Commons produce one new fact to influence the revocation. No, sir, there is no reason to doubt the fact that the receipt of the French decree produced the revocation of the Orders in Council on the 23d of June 1812. Nor is there any pretence for saying that the same would not have produced the same effect on the 23d of June, 1811. With all these facts before us, is it not clear as the light of day, that, if the repealing decree of France had not been concealed, if at the time of its date it had been made known to Congress, to Britain, and to the world, this war would have been averted?

H. OF R.

French Decrees.

JUNE, 1813.

And now, let me appeal to this House and to the people of America—if this decree was communicated to Mr. Russell in April, 1811, and by him suppressed, he merits and shall receive the everlasting execrations of his country. If either by Mr. Russell or the Minister Serrurier, it was communicated to Mr. Monroe, and by him concealed from the Executive, is there a niche in the temple of infamy sufficiently infamous for him? But if, by any means, the decree came to the knowledge of the President; and if he, either through a paltry fear of proving his proclamation false, or from any other motive, buried it in darkness, and thereby delivered that country, which, by every bond human and divine, he was bound to protect, over to all the miseries of an unnecessary and bloody war, what maledictions can suit his conduct; what new and horrible punishment is commensurate with the bloody crime? Sir, the President is old, and the reproaches of man may concern and move him but little. But he must soon appear at the bar of Immortal Justice. If he has done this deed, how will he stand appalled before the accusing spirits of youth “untimely slain in battle?” How will his soul recoil from those bloody ravages, that wide devastation, that mass of human misery, which his own guilty conduct shall have produced!

Shall I be asked, if I believe the Executive has done this guilty deed? I answer, frankly and sincerely, no. However poorly I may think of the political character and conduct of the Executive, I do not believe him capable of a crime of such complicated wickedness; combining all the blackest attributes of official turpitude, murder, and treason. But, sir, my belief or disbelief has nothing to do with the subject. It is not to satisfy myself alone, that I press this call—I have a more exalted motive. I stand on higher ground. The honor, the purity of my native country is shrouded in darkness. Sir, national honor is a plant of peculiar growth; it can live and flourish only in the broad blaze of day; cover it with clouds and darkness, it withers and dies. The honor of my country cannot long survive amid the dark and pestilential vapors which hang around it. To disperse those clouds and vapors, to restore it to the genial beams of day, that America, Europe, and the world, may again behold it bright and unsullied; to frown contempt on the bloody despot who has striven to stain and destroy it—these are the objects—these I fondly hope will be the effects of this measure.

Has this House considered the black and hideous aspect which this subject now presents to the American people? Has it reflected that, at this moment, the foul accusation stands before this people and the world, uncontradicted, unexamined, unresented? If it is suffered thus to remain in mystery, its truth will soon be considered as established, and the stain on the American character so deeply fixed, as to defy every effort to wash it away.

Sir, examine for a moment the circumstances of this dark affair. I have said that, from the date of the letter of the Duke of Cadore, from August 5th, 1810, down to the 20th of May 1812, the British Government invariably refused to give credit to that letter, as a repeal or modification of the French decrees. That Government declared the letter false and jesuitical, and invariably demanded some authentic instrument of repeal, issued by the French Government itself. For such an instrument, our Ministers in France had importuned the Emperor, always without success, until, on the 10th of May, 1812, Mr. Barlow prevailed, and the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, was produced.

And here permit me to read a short extract from the letter of Mr. Barlow to Mr. Monroe, bearing date the 12th May 1812. In this letter is contained an account of the ignominious attack upon the honor of the Executive:

“When, in the conversation above alluded to, the Duke first produced to me the decree of the 28th April 1811, I made no comment on the strange manner in which it had been so long concealed from me, and probably from you. I only asked him if that decree had been published—he said no, but declared that it had been communicated to my predecessor, here, and likewise sent to Mr. Serrurier, with orders to communicate it to you. I assured him that it was not among the archives of this legation; that I never before had heard of it,” &c.

Had the vile accusation been promptly contradicted, no doubt would, or could have remained, as to the truth or falsehood of the charge. But, by a strange fatality, every act of the Executive, and of his Ministers and agents, has tended strongly to confirm its truth. Did Mr. Barlow contradict it? No; he simply declared, that he “never before had heard” of the decree. Has Mr. Russell, the “predecessor” of Mr. Barlow, ever publicly denied it? No; he has been well contented that his honor should remain stigmatized by the black accusation.

And what has been the conduct of the Executive? The session of Congress in which the war was declared did not terminate until the 6th of July. Mr. Barlow received the decree on the 10th of May preceding. Of course, unless there was uncommon delay, it must have been received by the Executive while Congress was in session. Why was it concealed from them? Was it feared that, even then, if convinced of the perfidy of France, the falsehood of the proclamation, and the error of all their own acts founded on that proclamation, they would provide a remedy for all their errors, and prevent the war? Was it feared, that even then, the banquet of blood might be refused to the guests, whose knives were sharpened and whose appetites were importunate for the barbarous feast? Locked up in the bosom of the Executive, it did remain until Congress met in the succeeding November. Then, surely, the foul accusation was communicated to the representatives of the people; then, surely, the feelings of wounded honor, of indignant innocence, smarting under false imputation of guilt, burst forth in tones of denial, reproach, and resentment? I feel degraded, as an American, when I am forced to answer, no. Still the infamous imputation is concealed from the American people—from the representatives of the people, the peculiar guardians of their interests and their honor. And never until the 4th of March, the very last day, and almost the last hour of the session, was it dragged from its concealment, by a resolution of this House.

French Decrees.

H. OF R.

Even then, not a word of denial, not a whisper of innocence, not a murmur of resentment is heard. If the subject is permitted to rest in its present mystery, by every rule of evidence and of common sense, what must be the inference? What the decision of the world upon the conduct of the President? Guilty, guilty! will be the universal verdict; and not a man will exist without this nation, who will doubt the justice of the verdict.

We are asked, if the "infamous Duke of Bassano," the author of the charge, is competent to excite a suspicion against our Executive? Mr. Speaker, this Minister is the official organ of the Emperor; he occupies the same office as did the Duke of Cadore when he wrote the famous letter of August 5th, 1810. The Executive then recognised the act of the Minister as the act of the Government. By what article of logic shall he now be permitted, when his own character is involved, to escape the rule which he then established?

In this condition is this dark subject now placed: The foul accusation has been made, officially made, by the Government of France. By every motive of policy, of honor, of truth, the Executive was bound to stamp falsehood on the infamous charge, and indignantly to hurl it back upon the imperial calumniator. This honorable and virtuous course he has not pursued. Let us, now, as the guardians of American truth and honor, demand it at his hands.

But a member from Tennessee (Mr. RHEA) has justified the President in not denying the accusation, or resenting the insult. It might, he has told us, obstruct our negotiation and injure our interests in France; in other words, the tyrant might resent our attempts to vindicate our honor.

Mr. Speaker, have we arrived at that degenerate age of our Republic, when a Representative of the people dare advance such slavish doctrines on this floor? What, sir, will you truckle to France to obtain justice? Will you, like the crouching spaniel, patiently endure the whips and scorns of an outrageous tyrant, lest he should frown upon you?

O, my country! if such is truly your degraded condition, mock the world no more with your vain boasts of freedom! If, to avoid the resentment and injustice of a tyrant, you must smile at insult, and become familiar with dishonor, tear in atoms your instrument of independence, strike the proud Eagle from your escutcheon, and blot from your history the names of Warren, Montgomery, and Washington. No, sir, no! I never will believe until I hear it from his own lips, that any President of this high-minded people has dared to dishonor his country upon motives and principles like this. Mr. Speaker, there was a time when our Executive was not so slow to announce and to resent an insult offered to him and his Ministers. I allude to the famous "insult" offered by the British Minister Jackson. That "insult," as it was called, at the very worst, consisted in a reflection on the honor and veracity of the Secretary of State. And how was it then received and treated? no consideration of consequences was then permitted; then the honor of the Government must be vindicated, although at the hazard of national prosperity, happiness, and peace. A flame was kindled in the Cabinet, which continued to blaze until the whole nation became hot with indignation and fury. What then was the conduct of this House and of Congress? They, too, caught the epidemic fury; joint resolutions were passed, solemnly pledging themselves to the American people, and to the world, to stand by and support the Executive Government, "to call into action the whole force of the nation to repel such insults, and to assert and maintain the rights, the honor, and the interests of the United States."

What a mighty spirit of honor and indignation is here exhibited against a British Minister, upon whom, by implication, an intention to insult the honor of the Executive, had been fastened. Now mark the astonishing, the inglorious contrast; an injury, compared with which, the petty offence of the British Minister changes its character and becomes applause, has been offered to our Executive by the mushroom despot of France. How has it been received by the Cabinet? In silence, in poor, mean-spirited silence; nay, every effort has been made to cover it from the American people, and to conceal it from the world. For more than one year, the Executive has thus borne the basest insult which was ever offered to an independent people. In the meantime, what has been the conduct of this House and of Congress? Whether astonished at the tame endurance of the President, or resolved to share with him the disgrace, I know not; they, too, have been silent.

No blustering resolutions have appeared; no expression of resentment; and even now when the minority, forced by the inertness of the majority, have stepped forward, resolved to present the subject in its naked truth, and to call on the Executive to wipe the dishonor from his own character, and to vindicate the purity of this Republic, how are they met? Every covert obstruction is thrown in their way; and although the majority shrink from open resistance to this honorable course, yet no effort is left untried to render it futile and unavailing. Mr. Speaker, do insults and injuries change their nature with the change of persons who inflict them? Is an English insult one thing, and a French insult a different thing? Is the one atrocious, and to be resisted and resented "with the whole force of this nation," and is the other innocent, and to be borne with patience and submission?

French Decrees.

When a British Minister "insinuates an insult," is this Government to kindle a conflagration through the nation, threatening to consume not only him, but our own happiness and peace: and is the same Government to bare its back to the "scorpion lash" of a French despot, to receive with composure and silent submission the palpable calumnies, the barefaced insults of his mushroom Ministers?

Let gentlemen examine well the ground on which they are treading!

There are thousands and hundreds of thousands of this people, who do believe that your councils are contaminated by the influence and guided by the hand of France. For a series of years they have beheld, or they think they have beheld, the hand of the despot in our affairs. They have seen, or they think they have seen, their Government the unresisting dupe of French intrigue, the tame object of French insult and injury. If it so please you, call these men Tories; call them the friends of England; call them the victims of delusion; call them what you will, still, until you "can rail their judgments from their minds," or until your councils change, such will continue their honest belief. By rejecting these resolutions you fix their opinions forever. If they are deluded, you establish their delusion beyond the possibility of removal. On the other hand, if you pass these resolutions, and if, in consequence thereof, the President shall dissolve the darkness, shall step forth to the public pure and unspotted—if he shall evince that he has felt and acted as it became the chief of a highminded and free people; and if he has repelled and resented the base imputation, happy beyond measure, happy will be consequences of this proceeding. On my conscience, I believe it will go farther to destroy all suspicion of French influence—it will go farther to restore confidence in the Executive, than any other means that could have been selected.

FRIDAY, JUNE 18.

A bill was received from the Senate further to extend the time for issuing and locating military land warrants. The bill was twice read, and, on motion of Mr. McKEE, it was read a third time, and passed.

FRENCH DECREES.

The House resumed the consideration of Mr. WEBSTER's resolutions, respecting the French repealing decree.

Mr. GRUNDY rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, knowing that Congress had been convened at this time for the express purpose of providing an adequate revenue for the prosecution of the war in which our country is engaged, I did believe that a discussion not immediately connected with this subject should have been avoided; but, as the Committee of Ways and Means are not yet prepared to act on the bills reported by them, that time may not be entirely lost which is given to the examination of points which have been introduced into this debate.

The motion before us is to postpone indefinitely the consideration of the resolutions on your table; in other words, to reject them; to this I am opposed. I shall vote for them, and if modified in an inconsiderable degree, shall do so with pleasure. In doing this, I shall be governed by reasons entirely different from those which have been assigned by gentlemen who have preceded me. I shall vote for them to do away the effect which has been produced, and may again be produced, by the misrepresentations of the friends of that fast-anchored isle, which, according to the opinions of some gentlemen, has done us no essential injury; I shall vote for them, that the friends of that nation which is styled by some the bulwark of our holy religion may not mislead any portion of the American people. I shall vote for them that the advocates of that nation which is said to be fighting the battles of the world may not have it in their power to weaken the arm of this Government in its present contest with a foreign Power. These, sir, are the reasons on which I act, and not because I believe their adoption necessary to vindicate the honor of the Government or the character of those who administer it. The reputation of this Administration stands on a basis too solid to be shaken by any statement which the Duke of Bassano has or can make; and had not these new guardians of the Executive honor (Messrs. WEBSTER, OAKLEY, and GROSVENOR) been more sensitive than its old friends, no measure of this kind would have been deemed necessary. As this however is the first effort in their new vocation, so far as depends on my exertions, they shall be indulged and gratified. I have already said, that I shall vote with gentlemen on the other side of the House for reasons very different from their own. Were I at liberty to speak of motives, I would undertake to show that in these we differ no less than we have already in the reasons avowed. It has been alleged by those who have advocated these resolutions, that if an authentic document containing the decree of the French Government, bearing date the 28th day of April, 1811, and which so modifies the decrees of Berlin and Milan as to exempt the United States from their operations, had been furnished to the British Government before the declaration of war, that the Orders in Council would have been revoked, and thereby war would have been avoided. If I have mistaken the position which gentlemen have laid down as the basis on which their whole argument is founded, I beg now to be set right. [Mr. GROSVENOR, of New York, stated that Mr. GRUNDY had not mistaken their meaning.] Mr. GRUNDY then proceeded—Then, sir we are at issue: I deny the position laid down, and aver that the British Cabinet would not have repealed the Orders in Council, had a copy of the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, been communicated previously to the declaration of war. I shall not follow the example which has been set by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) I shall not quote from memory the evidences on which I rely. I will not expose myself to that error into which others have fallen by trusting to their recollection, when referring to documents in their support. I have these documents before me, and will show from them that Great Britain required, as the condition on which she would revoke her Orders in Council, that the French decrees of Berlin and Milan should previously be rescinded, not as to the United States only, but as to all neutral nations. If this be done, gentlemen must be driven from that ground which they have occupied with so much ostentation; for it will be recollected, that the French decree merely withdraws from the United States the operation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and leaves the decrees themselves in full force against all other neutrals. The Prince Regent, in his declaration of 21st of April, 1812, uses the following language when speaking of the Orders in Council:

"And which His Majesty has at all times professed his readiness to revoke, as soon as the decrees which gave occasion to them should be formally and unconditionally repealed, and the commerce of neutral nations be restored to its accustomed course."

In the same instrument he also says:

"And to give a decisive proof of his Royal Highness's disposition to perform the engagements of His Majesty's Government, by revoking the Orders in Council whenever the French decrees shall be actually and unconditionally repealed, his Royal Highness declares, &c., that if at any time hereafter the Berlin and Milan decrees shall, by some authentic act of the French Government publicly promulgated, be expressly and unconditionally repealed, then and from thenceforth the orders of 7th of January, 1807, and 26th of April, 1809, shall, without any further order, be from thenceforth revoked."

Now, I would ask any legal character to put a construction upon what has been read. Will he not answer, as every man must answer who understands the meaning of English words, that the term repeal imports, ex vi termini, a total abrogation of the act to which it refers? It does not mean modification or alteration, but an entire annulling of the act itself, placing everything as it was previous to its passage, saving only the rights which had accrued under it. But, here it appears that the Prince Regent not only requires a repeal, but he requires it also to be unconditional; not limited and partial, but universal in its operation. Can gentlemen longer affect to believe that a modification of the Berlin and Milan decrees would have satisfied the demands of the Prince Regent? Surely they have not read with attention these documents, or have read them without a disposition to understand them correctly. But, sir, why rely upon construction, when we have the interpretation which the enemy himself has put upon his own act? If it shall be shown that no ministerial advocate in Parliament, no Minister of England at home or abroad; no, not even Lord Castlereagh, has ever advanced such a position, then why should gentlemen upon this floor assume this new and extraordinary ground, unless they are resolved to out-Herod Herod, and out-Castlereagh Lord Castlereagh himself?

When Mr. Foster was in this country, he corresponded with our Government on this point. He, the Minister of his Sovereign, and sent here to interpret his will; he, who it must be presumed well understood the views of his own Government, demanded, (as I will show from the communications which passed between him and the American Secretary of State,) as a condition of the revocation of the Orders in Council, a total and entire repeal of the French decrees. That Minister, in his letter of the 30th of May, 1812, says:

"America, as the case now stands, has not a pretence for claiming from Great Britain a repeal of her Orders in Council; she must recollect that the British Government never for a moment countenanced the idea that the repeal of those orders could depend upon any partial or conditional repeal of the decrees of France. What she always avowed was, her readiness to rescind her Orders in Council, as soon as France rescinded absolutely and unconditionally her decrees. She could not enter into any engagements without the grossest injustice to her allies, as well as to neutral nations in general; much less could she do so, if any special exception was to be granted by France upon conditions utterly subversive of the most important and indisputable maritime rights of the British Empire."

Here the British Minister plainly lays down the principle upon which the British Government is determined to act. The French decrees are to be rescinded absolutely and unconditionally, by which it appears that England required of us not only that we should cause the decrees of Berlin and Milan to be repealed as to the United States, but as to all the world. Could a more unreasonable requisition be conceived? We had a right to demand of France a modification of her decrees so far as we were affected by them, but no farther—whenever she went so far as to prevent any injury to us by their operation, our claims upon that Government ceased, we having no right to interfere between her and her enemy, except so far as we were interested. But England, not content with this, insists that we shall cause the French Government to open the ports of all neutrals to British commerce, and make the continent of Europe a market for her manufactures. This we had no right to demand of the French Government, and England knew we could not obtain it. In the letter of the 3d of June, 1812, from Mr. Monroe to Mr. Foster, a reference is had not only to the declaration contained in the letter I have just read, but also to the instructions given by Lord Castlereagh to Mr. Foster, which convey the same ideas in stronger terms. It says, "in the letter of May the 30th, which I had the honor to receive from you on the 1st instant, I perceive a difference in a particular passage of it, from a passage on the same subject, in the despatch from Lord Castlereagh to you, which you were so good as to communicate to me entire, as appears from the tenor of the letter to have been intended by your Government." The passage in your letter to which I allude is as follows: "America, as the case now stands," &c., as in the preceding quotation. Mr. Monroe then proceeds:

"According to the tenor of the despatch of Lord

H. OF R.

French Decrees.

JUNE, 1813.

Castlereagh to you, my recollection is, that in stating the condition on which the Orders in Council were to be repealed, in relation to the United States, it was specified that the decrees of Berlin and Milan must not be repealed singly and specially in relation to the United States, but be repealed also as to all other neutral nations; and that in no less extent of a repeal of the decrees had the British Government ever pledged itself to repeal the Orders in Council. However susceptible the passage in your letter may be, of a construction reconcilable with the import of the despatch from Lord Castlereagh, yet as a similar phraseology of your Government on other occasions has had a construction less extensive, and as it is important in every respect that there should be no misunderstanding or possibility of error, you will excuse me for requesting that you will have the goodness to inform me whether in any circumstance my recollection of the import of this passage in Lord Castlereagh's despatch is inaccurate."

Mr. Foster in no part of his after communications pretends that Mr. Monroe had mistaken the contents of Lord Castlereagh's instructions. Here, then, you have not only the statement of the British Minister to our Government, but the authority under which he acted. In this there can be no mistake, no misapprehension.

On the 10th of June, 1812, Mr. Foster, if possible, becomes more explicit. He then declares to the Secretary of State:

"I have no hesitation in saying that Great Britain, as the case has hitherto stood, never did nor ever could engage, without the grossest injustice to herself and her allies, as well as to other neutral nations, to repeal her orders affecting America alone, leaving them in force against other States, upon condition that France would except, singly and specially, America from the operation of her decrees."

This declaration it would seem had removed every doubt which could possibly exist in relation to the intention of the British Government. But the Executive of the United States, solicitous to avoid the evils of war and to prevent an appeal to the last resort of injured nations, on the 13th day of June, 1812, again addresses the British Minister in the following terms:

"It is satisfactory to find that there has been no misapprehension of the condition without which your Government refuses to repeal the Orders in Council. You admit that, to obtain their repeal in respect to the United States, the repeal of the French decrees must be absolute and unconditional, not as to the United States only, but as to all other neutral nations; not as far as they affect neutral commerce only, but as they operate internally and affect the trade in British manufactures with the enemy of Great Britain. As the Orders in Council have formed a principal cause of the differences which unhappily exist between our countries, a condition of their repeal communicated in any authentic document or manner was entitled to particular attention. And surely none could have so high a claim to it as the letter from Lord Castlereagh to you, submitted by his authority to my view for the express purpose of making that condition, with its other contents, known to this Government."

From this it is evident that the Executive of this country understood the British Minister, as insisting on a total repeal of the French decrees before the Orders in Council would be revoked.

And another fact equally important is manifested by this document, which is, that the British Government had not only a knowledge of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees so far as related to the United States, but communicated that knowledge to their Minister Resident in this country, with a view that he might confer with this Government respecting the terms and conditions contained in it. How then can it be contended, with the least degree of plausibility, that it was the want of evidence of the existence of the decree of the 28th day of April, 1811, which induced the British Government to persist in its Orders in Council? To the letter last mentioned, Mr. Foster on the 14th of June gives an answer which closes the correspondence between the parties. The language is too plain to admit of but one construction. Listen to it and tell me if the most sceptical man can doubt:

"I will now say that I feel entirely authorized to assure you, that if you can at any time produce a full and unconditional repeal of the French decrees, as you have a right to demand it in your character of a neutral nation, and that it be disengaged from any question concerning our maritime rights, we shall be ready to meet you with a revocation of the Orders in Council. Previously to your producing such an instrument, which I am sorry to see you appear to regard as unnecessary, you cannot expect of us to give up our Orders in Council."

The Prince Regent, on the face of the decree which revokes the Orders in Council, shows that the meaning of the British Government was what I have contended for; and although other gentlemen may understand the views of the British Cabinet better than I do, yet I am bound to consider the Prince Regent of England good authority, when speaking of the intentions of his own Government, and to its disadvantage. The French decree, bearing date the 28th of April, 1811, is a full and absolute repeal as it relates to the United States. The language is:

"The Decrees of Berlin and Milan are definitively and to date from 1st November last, considered as not existing in regard to American vessels."

More than thirty days after, a copy of this decree was furnished to the British Government. They repeal the Orders in Council; and upon the face of that repeal, the Prince Regent declares, "That he cannot consider the tenor of the said instrument as satisfying the conditions set forth in the order of the 21st of April, 1812."

Why was this not a compliance with the declaration of April, 1812? As to the United States it was full and complete. It was because it was not a repeal as it related to all neutral Powers.

Mr. Speaker, I feel humbled and abased that it has become my duty to quote the authority of the Prince Regent and the British Ministers against the Representatives of my own country. I am mortified to hear doctrines advanced here in behalf of the British Cabinet which the British Ministers never avowed, and which they would not avow were they present and entitled to be heard on this floor. Sir, they would not dare to do so—their own words would confound them. I do hope, sir, that gentlemen who are still determined to persist in opposition, will take some other ground on which to rely; for it surely adds nothing to the honor of this country or to their individual credit to advance and advocate doctrines which the British Ministry would be ashamed to own.

Sir, unless I am altogether mistaken in the meaning of the plainest terms—unless the English language is entirely unintelligible to me—the point is sufficiently established, that the British Government would not have revoked the Orders in Council, had a copy of the French decree, modifying the Berlin and Milan decrees, been presented to them; and the gentlemen on the other side of the House must be constrained to abandon the ground they have relied on; and here this debate might close. For, although the French decree is made the pretext for the repeal of the Orders in Council, every man acquainted with the political state of the two countries must be satisfied that it was the suffering condition of the British manufacturers, united with the apprehension of an American war, which produced that change in British policy which did take place.

Remarks have fallen from gentlemen which merit a reply. An honorable member from New York (Mr. OAKLEY) has told you, sir, that we have charged upon the Opposition all the calamities and disasters of the war. I am one of the accusers, but I do not raise the accusation against those who voted against the war upon this floor, nor against any who express their opinions against it elsewhere. I know there are many in the opposition who are governed by honest motives, who oppose the war from an honest conviction, and whose opposition is confined within reasonable and Constitutional bounds. Whom then do I accuse? I accuse him, sir, who professes himself to be the friend of this country and enjoys its protection, yet proves himself by his actions to be the friend of its enemy. I accuse him who sets himself to work systematically to weaken the arm of this Government by destroying its credit and damping the ardor of its citizens; I accuse him who has used his exertions to defeat the loan and to prevent the young men of the country from going forth to fight their country's battles; I accuse him who announces with joy the disasters of our arms, and sickens into melancholy when he hears of our success; such men I cannot consider friends to this nation.

Sir, I speak in plain language, because I am speaking the language of truth in the cause of my country. I ask, how is this war to be carried on and how are we to gain an advantage over the enemy? Money has justly been called the sine qua non of war; without money men cannot be raised, and without men battles cannot be gained—yet battles must be fought and gained, before a peace, safe, honorable, and durable, can be obtained for this nation. Is not that man then subverting the interest of the enemy, who, to the extent of his power, keeps money from our coffers and men from our armies? And what, sir, is the greatest crime known to our Constitution and our laws? If a citizen goes over to the enemy and arms in his behalf, he is guilty of treason. The overt act is consummated, and the wickedness of his heart is demonstrated. Should the same citizen remain amongst us, and employ himself in aiding the enemy, by paralyzing the national energies, is not the turpitude of his conduct and his moral guilt equally great? Does he not serve the enemy as effectually? Nay, more; suppose he shall succeed in preventing ten men from joining the Army, has he not rendered the enemy much more service than if he had actually joined the ranks of the enemy and raised the sword in his favor? To my mind, it is impossible to draw a line of distinction between adding to the strength of the enemy and taking from the strength of his own country. In both cases he is working the ruin of his country, so far as that result depends on his exertions—and the only difference to himself is, that in one case he forfeits his life for his crime, in the other he lives an object of public execration and loaded with the abhorrence of all good men.

While upon the subject of the war and the conduct of Opposition, suffer me, Mr. Speaker, to devote another moment to the almost incomprehensible part which they are seen to act. They call themselves the friends of peace, yet what step do they take to procure it for their country? Now that the war rages upon the frontiers, peace can only be obtained by expelling the enemy from our borders, or by negotiating with him. Which method does the Opposition prefer? It cannot be the former, because they withhold from the Government, so far as they can do so, all the means of effecting it. Is it the latter? Then why not come out with a candid declaration in favor of the Russian mediation—why not rejoice that an extraordinary mission is despatched to St. Petersburg? And yet upon this subject an impenetrable silence has been preserved; no sentence of approbation has escaped their lips; from them we have not heard the Emperor of Russia applauded for his friendly disposition manifested towards this country, by interposing his kind offices between the two nations. Sir, an eternal cry of peace, peace, peace! is kept up, while, at the same time, objection after objection, difficulty after difficulty, obstacle after obstacle, is thrown in the way of the Government, in every attempt made to bring the war to a speedy termination. Every attempt to negotiate is treated with ridicule, and every means of carrying on the war successfully is withheld, so far as they can effect it—and these are the friends of peace. Can gentlemen believe that the American people are to be deceived and imposed on by professions which are daily contradicted by actions? What does this extraordinary conduct mean? For something must be meant when even a system of contradiction is persisted in with so much pertinacity and zeal. Will gentlemen compel me to say, that self-aggrandizement is the object and aim of many who practise this conduct? That war, protracted and disastrous, lingering and ruinous, is the secret wish of no small portion of the leaders of that party which cries so loudly for peace; war which shall involve in ruin the Administration that declared it, and which shall bring into power the men who were put down by the people twelve or thirteen years ago.

Sir, I felt some astonishment to hear the member from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) who had no seat in this House when war was declared, who was not even in this city at that time, state with so much confidence in what events the war would or would not have taken place. If the public documents are referred to it will be seen, that the impressment of our seamen was considered as a principal cause of the war. In the Executive Messages of that session, in the Reports of the Committee of Foreign Relations, it will be seen that the language of freemen was employed, the liberty of the citizen being deemed more valuable and precious than his property. I was one of those who voted for the war, and ought to be presumed to know something of the opinions and sentiments which prevailed at that time, and yet I feel no hesitation in saying, that no man can pronounce what would have been the course pursued, had the Orders in Council been revoked. I have heard many members say they would have voted for the war had the Orders in Council been previously abandoned—I have heard others say they would not; and yet the gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) affects to speak with great confidence and precision on this subject. There are two reasons why this honorable gentleman should have been less confident in his assertions. In the first place he was not present when the war was declared; in the second, he belonged to the Opposition, and would not, on that account, have been so freely communicated with by those who supported it.

Sir, I wish gentlemen clearly and distinctly to answer me this question—Will they give up the principle of impressment? Will they suffer the petty officers of the British Navy to seize at their pleasure American citizens, force them into a foreign service, and compel them with stripes to fight the battles of the enemy, even against that country which gave them birth? If so, let it be known to the people—let it be proclaimed to this nation of freemen—and let the line of distinction be drawn between those who will and those who will not submit to this tyranny of “the mistress of the seas.” Gentlemen have indeed said that they will not fight for the question of impressment. But will they surrender it? Will they yield this point to the King of Great Britain? Will they say that the slaves of George the Third have a right to seize and drive into captivity the freemen of the American States? I demand an answer—yea or nay. There is no difficulty in understanding the question. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) in adverting to the correspondence between Mr. Monroe and Mr. Foster, affects great difficulty in understanding its meaning. I cannot see wherein this difficulty lies—the language is plain, void of ambiguity, conveying distinct ideas, in clear and unequivocal expressions. The same gentleman has the modesty to tell you that Mr. Monroe and Mr. Foster did not understand the meaning of the words actually and unconditionally. What, sir! your Secretary of State, who has visited, in the character of an American Minister, nearly half the Courts of Europe—he whose literary acquirements have done honor to this nation, not understand the meaning of the common English words actually and unconditionally? Mr. Foster, too, the accredited Minister of the “fast-anchored Isle,” sent by the British Government upwards of three thousand miles to negotiate upon delicate and difficult points, is charged with the like ignorance. Sir, the gentleman who introduced these resolutions, (Mr. WEBSTER,) if he has ever read his namesake’s spelling-book, (and no doubt he has,) can readily expound them. Even a schoolboy can tell you their meaning. I feel no great solicitude or tenderness about the reputation of the late British Minister, but surely he ought not to be subject to this imputation.

In one idea advanced by the Opposition, I perfectly concur: if the Executive had received a copy of the French decree previous to the declaration of war, and had withheld it from the British Minister, I should say he deserved the execration of his country. The honorable gentleman who has manifested such critical skill in language might have drawn its character in terms of blackest import, and I would subscribe to it; but I know, with moral certainty, that the answer of the President will dissipate every idea of that kind—it will show, that, in the whole of this transaction, he has conducted with fairness and uprightness, and from a desire to prevent a conflict between this and any other nation. Yes, sir, he has acted in obedience to honorable feelings, to which many who implicate him are entire strangers.

It is said, that formerly, when Mr. Jackson insulted this Government, there was great solicitude manifested to resent it. Sir, who manifested on that occasion a disposition to maintain the honor and dignity of this nation? I answer, this side of the House. At the same time, who palliated, who excused, who apologized for that greatest of outrages? and who attempted, finally, to justify it? Why, sir, the political associates of these very men who have just taken the honor of this Administration into their keeping.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) says, that a suspicion prevails among many of both parties in this country, that French influence has found its way into our councils. I do believe, that among the prevailing party, the great majority of the nation, there are none who suspect it. In the Opposition, I am satisfied there are a few who have been so far misled as to entertain such a suspicion: but many are they who speak of French influence, and do not believe it exists; they use it to alarm and deceive others. But is it not strange that the very party which has labored to excite this suspicion should now become so clamorous to put it down?

Having answered all the observations of others which are deemed material, I will make a few inquiries of the honorable mover of these resolutions (Mr. WEBSTER) He certainly best knows the objects intended, and I pray him to answer for himself, and not by proxy. Is it his object to make it appear that the Duke of Bassano has been guilty of falsehood? If that shall turn out to be the case, what then? Will he make it a ground of going to war against France? Great, indeed, are the insults and injuries which we have received from the French Government, and much noise has the Opposition made respecting them; but, sir, when my friend from Kentucky (Mr. McKEE) offered a proposition to declare war against France, did the gentlemen on the other side of this House vote for it? To the best of my recollection, three of them voted for the measure—a majority of votes in favor of the proposition were given by this side of the House. He will not, I apprehend, say that he will go to war with France on this account. Is it intended to predicate any legislative act on the information which may be received from the Executive? I can conceive of no legislative act which can grow out of it. What, then, do gentlemen mean? What can be the object of these resolutions? To make it appear that France has acted with bad faith, and yet neither go to war nor pass any legislative act in consequence of it? I can see but one thing which gentlemen can promise themselves to follow from this course of proceeding. They may hope by this to throw new difficulties in the way of the Administration, to draw off the attention of the people from the prosecution of the war, paralyze the national energies, and multiply the chances of getting new men into power. If this be the object, the gentleman may please himself with the idea of having labored for the good of his country; but sure I am that the country can derive no benefit from such a course, however great his labors may be.

To show what has been done by an American Congress, how men have ceased their opposition, when the good of the country required it, I know full well, sir, would avail but little. But on this occasion, we may profit from the conduct of the enemy: he has set an example well worthy of imitation. Although in the British Parliament many were opposed to a war with America and all those measures which produced it, yet when war had broken out they threw no obstacle in the way of its success; they voted the necessary supplies, they joined in the resolution to carry it on with vigor—for they recollected that England was their country and America its enemy. If such has been the conduct of an English opposition, what ought to be the conduct of American Representatives? If the slaves of a despot feel the impulse of patriotism, and act in obedience to its mandates, how much more should it be the case in this land of liberty, where the interest of each individual is intimately connected with the welfare of the Government, and where every citizen is his own master!

Mr. SHIPHERD addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, after the very able manner in which the subject under consideration has been discussed, by my honorable friends on this side of the House, I cannot hope to do more than glean the trifles which they have left me.

The honorable gentlemen on my left are opposed to the resolutions before the House; and in order the more effectually to combat them, have introduced topics of discussion wholly extrinsic and foreign from the proper subject of debate. Sir, in my opinion, they have lost sight of the question, and unnecessarily drawn into dispute what they call the merits of the war, and the demerits of one of the great political parties of this country.

Why, sir, all this zealous opposition to the adoption of these resolutions? Do they fear that a disclosure of the truth may injure the reputation or feelings of the President? Do they fear, if the veil should be rent asunder, which has so long concealed this dark and mysterious transaction, that it would appear to us, the American people, and the world, that the Executive had been a traitor to the dearest interests of that people, whose mistaken partiality had invested him with the honorable badges of exalted office? If they do, sir, I pity their timidity, and blush for them; but I hope they have no such fears. I sincerely hope the Chief Magistrate of this great and once honorable nation, has not sunk to such an abominable depth of corruption, as to conceal a public document of such importance as the decree of revocation of the 28th of April, 1811. A document, had it been timely promulgated, would have promised to hush the bickerings and contentions between us and Great Britain, to prevent a bloody war, to have enlivened and invigorated our fainting commerce, and restored our long lost prosperity.

It really appears to me, sir, that the gentlemen pay your President a very ill compliment in opposing the resolutions; for, should they succeed in that opposition, some might say that he and his friends dreaded the unmaiming truth; that they feared to see it stripped naked.

Sir, I submit to the House, to the gentlemen themselves, upon reflection, the question, if there would not be good cause of suspicion, that there had been an improper concealment of this paper, should the resolutions be voted down?

I have ever entertained some vulgar notions, that a frank and prompt disclosure of that which was proper to be disclosed, was a sort of presumptive evidence of integrity. And that an honest man would not wait to have the truth drawn from him as from the felon under examination, but would volunteer what a moral and political obligation required him to make public. I have supposed a certain kind of mysterious shrinking from the light, in public officers, in relation to official conduct; a rolling up in shade and secrecy transactions which the public wishes loudly demanded to be explained, was no very fair earnest of future good faith and honest dealing; or any very satisfactory proof that what had been done must necessarily be agreeable to the public sense of what ought to have been done. I have supposed, sir, that the honest and faithful steward would rather court than shun an inquiry into his stewardship; and, fortified with conscious integrity, would, at all times, be ready to exhibit his accounts, and prove himself trustworthy; and more especially, when suspicion had hovered over him and perched upon him. I should really think he would be unwilling to slumber away, year after year, with such a bird of prey devouring his reputation, but that he would instantly arouse himself, and with manly and heroic dignity drive her from her perch.

Sir, when the resolution of 1793, which has been read to the Committee, was under consideration, the Federal members of Congress, who were then a majority, felt no such fastidious delicacy for the character or dignity of the Great Washington; no prudery then was betrayed; no alarm, lest the then President should feel himself insulted; but the Federalists, to a man, voted for the adoption of the resolution. That resolution was drawn by a very great and ingenious man; it bespeaks the skill of its author; and it is too evident to be doubted, that one object, at least, of the resolution, was to forward the interest of the Democratic party. For that reason it is drawn with all the minuteness of interrogatory, of which so great a legislator and politician was capable; and yet the resolution was promptly adopted, and as promptly answered.

It has been supposed, by some honorable gentlemen over the way, that really the official dignity of the President is assailed by the resolutions before us; I wish some of the gentlemen had condescended to show in what respect. If there has been any attempt to prove that the resolutions, or any of them, contain any such mischievous quality, I have not been fortunate enough to hear; or if to hear, to understand the force of the reasoning. For, so far from hearing any argument to support the position, I do not know that any gentleman has even attempted it. As I understand it, the whole consists in the naked assertion that the fact is so. Could I be convinced that the gentlemen are correct, I would join them and vote down the resolutions at once. Sir, I beg leave here to enter my protest against that base, servile, anti-republican creed, which places any officer of our Government in that infallible and irresponsible station which will shut the doors of inquiry against the legislators of the people. We have a right to demand of the President information on subjects which are interesting to our constituents. That this demand should be made in respectful terms I admit; but in vain is it said, that the President is too high to be inquired of, and particularly inquired of, in relation to those things which concern his duty, and the public interests.

The honorable gentlemen do not deny this in positive terms; but if they do not mean to deny it, it is difficult to understand that they mean any thing. Sir, what do the resolutions require? That the Executive should inform us what has been done, by whom, and in what manner; and they also require, if a certain state of things exists, that he shall inform us whether the French Government have explained this mysterious affair; or whether he, the President, has ever demanded that explanation.

The resolutions indicate our belief that there is guilt somewhere, and they require that he should inform us who is the culprit. If these can with reason offend that great officer, blot them out of existence, that they may offend no more. However, if gentlemen will insist that the resolutions will be offensive to the President, I am constrained to say, they never can offend an honest man.

Sir, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) has admitted that there is guilt somewhere; either that the decree of 28th April, 1811, was concealed in the French Cabinet, or by our President, or that it was antedated.

Now, sir, whether the one or the other of the positions be true, no gentleman will venture to assert, is immaterial. I fear no contradiction when I make the assertion; for such a contradiction would be of so rare a nature that few, if any, gentlemen will be ambitious first to introduce it. It would be saying, at least, that it is a matter of indifference to the American people, whether their Chief Magistrate has been dabbling in the pollutions of French policy and French intrigue. Whether he has been ignorant of, or criminally concealed, a document, which, if it had been disclosed would have saved him from suspicion, and the nation from the horrors of war.

It would be saying, sir, that we have no interest in knowing whether Mr. Russell, our late Chargé d'Affaires in France, performed his diplomatic duty with integrity or not: whether he sold his country for Imperial smiles, or guarded her interests with scrupulous vigilance.

It would be saying that it was a matter of indifference to us whether France was acting with good faith in her correspondence with our Government, or whether we were made the dupe of imposture. Sir, if it would be correct to say all these things, then I admit that the resolutions are idle, and we are spending our time in vain; but if they are not correct, then it must create some surprise, that gentlemen who love their country with such amazing and exclusive warmth of affection, who discover so much zeal for her honor, should oppose with a spirit bordering on frenzy, measures, which it must be seen are calculated to favor her best interests, and heal her wounded honor.

Sir, I consider it a duty we owe Mr. Russell, the Executive, and the nation, diligently to inquire into this matter, and, if possible, to fix the guilt and odium upon the right man.

If Mr. Russell is innocent let him be put to the test, and acquitted before the world. If the President is innocent, it would be the height of injustice to him not to give him an opportunity to brush off the suspicions that have gathered upon him. If either or both of these gentlemen are guilty, we wrong our country if we do not awake from its slumbers this monster of sin. If the Emperor of France is guilty, (and really I can never suppose him otherwise,) it becomes highly interesting that the world should know the fact; that they should know how much confidence is to be reposed in the Imperial decrees of our loving friend, this cut-throat Emperor.

Will the gentleman say there is no cause of suspicion against the President? Sir, I cannot divest myself of a belief that all is not right in the Cabinet in relation to this affair. And I have been led to believe this, from a variety of suspicious circumstances which have been thickening and gathering upon my mind since the proclamation of the President of November 2, 1810, which emphatically declared that the decrees of Berlin and Milan were repealed.

Was this proclamation true? No, sir, it was false, and from the date of that proclamation, until the promulgation of the long-slumbering, repealing decree, purporting to bear date April 23, 1811, the French Emperor particularly charged upon the President this falsehood. He, the Emperor, after the date of that proclamation, and after he must have known of it, declared his decrees of Berlin and Milan to be a part of the laws of his Empire. Not only so, but the ocean from time to time was illuminated with the conflagration of our vessels, burned avowedly by the authority of the Emperor, and in pursuance of those decrees which our prophetic Chief Magistrate had declared to be repealed. Never was falsehood more evident! Mathematics cannot produce more certain demonstration.

Sir, I do not mean here to charge upon the President wilful and corrupt falsehood; but the least that can be said is, that he had been cheated, he was too proud to acknowledge it, and too much ensnared in the toils of his mighty friend to demand satisfaction.

Has this strange conduct ever been explained? No. Has any explanation ever been demanded? No. Has ever a murmur escaped the lips of the President? If it has the nation is ignorant of it. It is a melancholy truth, that while he was roaring at the British Government like a lion, he was cooing over the French with the gentleness of the dove.

From France he could be told that the American Government was "without honor," &c., and receive it with the utmost meekness; when from England a single sentence, (and which by the by no person could ever find,) a little sharply composed, set the whole Cabinet in a rage. Sir, I appeal to the good sense of mankind to judge if there is not abundant evidence to convince every unprejudiced mind, that equal measure has not been meted to the two belligerent nations.

If our Executive had drunken of the cup of Gallic pollutions—had become intoxicated with the Circean draught, an inducement might be found for the concealment of this repealing decree. For it is a well-known truth that the Emperor had fixed his heart upon an anticipated war between this country and England; so much so, that in the ravings of his frenzy and madness, he declared it for us. If, then, our Administration possessed the inclinations which have been imputed to them, what could be more natural than to conceal a paper which, if promulgated, would have taken away every pretext for war. A paper, made and laid up, with the same laudable motives that fraudulent deeds are made and laid up, to be used on any emergency which might require their production.

Sir, I will not charge any misconduct upon our Administration without proof. I do not here mean to charge them with anything artfully committed; but I do mean to be understood that the facts before the American people are strong evidence upon my mind, and I believe upon the minds of thousands, that there is much in our intercourse with France, which decisively demands of the Executive prompt and unambiguous explanation—that the honor of the nation, and the honor of the President, loudly demand it. I do mean to say that, unless this explanation is given, we have a right, indeed it is our duty, to withdraw our confidence from all concerned in the transactions. How, sir, can gentlemen hang their confidence upon the integrity of the Executive, if ultimately no reason shall be given for transactions which are irresistible presumptions to the candid mind, that the dearest interests of our country have been made subservient to the base intrigues, the ambition and malignant passions, of the greatest monster of depravity that ever waded to a throne through blood?

Sir, the President has been charged with falsehood by the Emperor of France; he or his Ministers have been charged with secreting—wickedly secreting—a very important document, in the disclosure of which the people of this country were deeply concerned; and if he has done so, the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) admits "he ought to be held up to the execration of mankind," and yet say some gentlemen, it is a matter of total indifference to us to know whether these charges are true or false.

For one, I never can be reconciled to consider it as a matter of indifference; and I entreat gentlemen to give the President and Mr. Russell an opportunity to deny this foul charge, and, so denied, the nation must and will believe them.

Let them deny it, and brand the infamous falsehood upon the Duke of Bassano. And I do not hesitate to say, if the President and Mr. Russell will disavow the truth of the statement of that Duke to our Minister, Mr. Barlow, they will be believed; for one, I would believe them, in preference to all the mushroom Dukes and Emperors that have grown into power in that Government, whose least vices are falsehood, imposition, and fraud.

Thus, sir, I have shown the absolute necessity of a speedy, a clear, and unequivocal disclosure of everything in relation to this business, as far as the knowledge of the Executive may extend. I shall now proceed to make some remarks in answer to the gentlemen on my left. Few must be those remarks, for I already feel my strength yielding to the intense heat of this hall.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee, who has just sat down, (Mr. GRUNDY,) stated in substance, if I understood him correctly, "that there was a party in this country, who neglected to aid the Administration in the prosecution of the war; and who had placed impediments in their way; who had refused to lend their money; that such men were guilty of moral treason; and that such conduct was as criminal, in a moral point of view, as to raise one's hand against the Government."

The gentleman declared that he did not mean any gentleman on this floor. For his courtesy in this respect, I thank him. But while I do so, I must inform that gentleman, that he will not be obliged to go far for traitors, if his definition of treason is correct.

I do not hesitate to acknowledge myself one of those persons, who, from the beginning until this time, have thought the war to be of a description in which I could not conscientiously engage, and that it was my duty to withhold from the Administration all voluntary assistance. I do acknowledge, sir, that I did believe the war to be declared in opposition to the dictates of common prudence, wisdom, humanity, policy, and religion; and I do acknowledge that I still continue of the same of opinion; I do sincerely believe, that it is a war inexpedient, and ruinous in its consequences; and to shed the blood of our peaceable, unoffending Canadian neighbors, in such a war, notwithstanding the legislative drapery in which it has been dressed, is, to adopt the honorable gentleman's own emphatical phraseology, in those who think as I do, moral murder. In me, sir, it would certainly be such. Therefore, to brand every man with the odious name of traitor, who withholds his hands from being crimsoned with human blood—every man who will not declare his approbation of the course of an Administration, who, with their mad projects, threaten to mark with ruin a country once prosperous and happy, is both unjust and cruel. But, I value the approving whispers of my own conscience, and the consoling reflection that I have obeyed the commands of Him, who has said, "Thou shalt not kill," far above the commendation of that honorable gentleman, and a world full of others, who may think as he does.

The gentleman (Mr. GRUNDY) does not seem to distinguish, with very great accuracy, between moral and legal obligations; those imposed by conscience, and those by law.

In the first case, we are left free to determine for ourselves; in the latter, we have no will.

In the former, I will obey the dictates of my judgment, my moral senses, and act as they decide; in the latter, I yield, I obey. Ask me to shed blood, or to lend my money as a price for it, and I refuse; demand of me a tax to support your war, and I will pay without hesitation. In the former case, I am left free, and, sir, in spite of anathemas that issue from the lips or pens of the friends of this war, I shall avail myself of that freedom, to withhold every possible aid from a war wicked and foolish in its commencement, and unwisely protracted. In the latter case, I bow to the Constitutional claims of my country, however indiscreetly that Constitutional power may have been exercised.

If I and my party are traitors, we are so Constitutionally, and not only Constitutionally, but we are traitors in obeying the commands of God and the precepts of Christianity. Strange morality—strange treason! Whatever afflictions I may be called to suffer in this world, I pray Heaven I never may be cursed by a union to a party who are governed by such a set of principles as these.

But, who are the men, that the honorable gentleman would call moral traitors? They are the sons of those fathers who first planted the tree of liberty in the American soil. They are the brave men, who, while contending for independence, braved the contest by the side of WASHINGTON. The men of the Eastern and Northern States. The very men whom WASHINGTON honored, and WASHINGTON loved, are in this enlightened age branded with the odious names of traitors and Tories. I do not wish to make distinctions among the States; it is unnecessary for my argument, and unpleasant; but I am warranted in saying, if these which are the friends of the present war bravely resisted British opposition, they did no more than those who are in principle opposed to the war. And, sir, I will say, that the principles which are embraced by the party so long and so cruelly slandered, are the same pure, sound, orthodox Whig principles which so much distinguished the patriots of Seventy-Six. And, sir, should these men, like their fathers, ever be called to defend their liberties against an enemy, from whatever part of the world it may come, that enemy will learn by experience, that the sons, as well as their sires, are neither to be awed by threats nor subdued by force. That "liberty or death" is the Eastern motto; and to erase that motto belongs not to their slanderers, wherever they may live.

Sir, having disposed of the gentleman's moral treason, let us inquire from whence has the money come, which has been loaned to the Government, to carry on this war? Will the gentleman venture to say, that it has been exclusively drawn from the pockets of men of his own party?

Will he deny that the Federalists own the principal part of the stock of the two last loans? I refer the honorable gentleman to the books, and I think he will be satisfied, that his own patriotic friends have not furnished the Government with all the money that has been loaned for this war; but that Federalists, have furnished, to say the least, the greatest part of it. If the honorable gentleman should search, it seems to me, he will find a most treasonable blank near the name of his own loyal State; for, if my recollection does not much deceive me, the Government have been fed with empty professions, instead of the more solid and useful tokens of affection, from a certain Western section of the Union.

Sir, in making this statement, I wish to be distinctly understood, as bestowing no commendation upon Federalists, who have labored in this Governmental shaving-mill. I consider that they have acted incorrectly; at war with their own principles. For it cannot, nor need not, be dissembled that the Federalists are universally opposed to the war; they deem it an unjustifiable and ruinous one, that it has been hatched in the fermented hot-bed of party prejudice. The man, therefore, who holds such language and entertains such opinions, and will, to gratify his avarice, lend his money to promote an object which he condemns as unwarranted, is guilty, in my opinion, of a censurable inconsistency; and should he lose that money, so unworthily loaned, it ought not, and, in me, it would not, excite any uneasiness on account of his loss.

French Decrees.

Sir, it has been said by the gentleman (Mr. GRUNDY) "if the repealing decree had been disclosed at its date, it would not have prevented the war, even if the Orders in Council had been repealed." And he seemed to be surprised at the temerity of my honorable colleague, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) who asserted to the contrary: "Especially, as my honorable colleague and his party were wholly ignorant of the secret views of the Administration, while the gentleman (Mr. GRUNDY) and his party were admitted to a participation of those views."

In the first place, I feel no disposition to deny that the honorable gentleman (Mr. GRUNDY) and his political friends are favored with the smiles and secret opinions of His Majesty, the President; and that they are honored with a familiar intercourse with that Nestor, the Vice President; and that the whole Executive Cabinet is open to them. And, sir, I have no inclination to deny what I am confident is true—that the whole Federal party are shut out from those gracious privileges.

And, sir, there is another truth that I have no disposition to deny, which is, that that republican Government is in jeopardy, tottering to its fall, whose Chief Magistrate has official secrets for one, and not for the other part of its Legislators. And, sir, I loathe and detest those midnight consultations and intrigues which are to favor the interests and resentments of one part of the nation at the expense of the happiness and interests of the other.

If gentlemen wish to know what induces me to believe that the war would not have been declared, if the repealing decree had been timely promulged, (and I presume the same reason induced my honorable colleague to think so,) I can very readily inform them. Had this decree been communicated to the British Government in time, that Government would have repealed the Orders in Council. Gentlemen may talk as much as they please of the declarations of the Prince Regent, the inference from what has been done is irresistible, upon every unprejudiced mind, to prove what would have been done. Sir, no truth is more certain than that those orders were repealed after the receipt of the repealing decree with as much promptness as the state of the British Cabinet would permit. And they verified, by a ready example, all their professions of a disposition to maintain a good understanding between their Government and the United States.

In vain, then, do gentlemen tell us of the length of time which elapsed between the communication of the repealing decree and the repealing of the Orders in Council; no honest, sensible man, will venture to deny that, in this instance, the British Cabinet acted with good faith, and with a sincere desire to maintain peace between the two countries.

The conclusion from these premises can be only one, and that is, that had the repealing decree been, as it ought to have been, disclosed seasonably to the British Cabinet, their Orders in Council would have been repealed; and we now should, instead of suffering the curses of this abominable war, have been enjoying the blessings of peace.

Sir, the gentleman from South Carolina (Mr. CALHOUN) asserted, that "if the Orders in Council had been repealed, yet we should have had war. The impressment of our seamen was a sufficient cause, and for that would they have declared it." Now, sir, much as I respect that gentleman's talents and integrity, in this instance I must believe he is mistaken. For I will not believe that the Administration would have been given up to such fatal infatuation, such a bewildering, deadly mania, that they would have been so incurably mad as to have plunged this nation into a war on a point, in principle, the most inconsiderable in controversy, without making one more effort, at least, to an amicable adjustment of differences.

I could not believe, if the melancholy fact was not in my view, that we should have been hurried into this war without preparation, and, of course, to loiter away month after month, without being able to commence any efficient operations.

Sir, I did believe that a candid, prudent ruler of the nation, that a wise Legislature, who regarded their country's happiness, would have paused before they made a desperate, frantic plunge into an abyss from which it might require an age to be retrieved. I did suppose that our Administration would have stopped and cooled before they emptied a whole vial of wrath upon our heads. And I still must believe, if the Orders in Council had been repealed before the declaration of war, the Government would not have declared it, for a mere principle in theory, which unquestionably might have been accommodated upon fair and equitable grounds. But, sir, if the honorable gentleman (Mr. CALHOUN) is right, we are mistaken; if so, we err in judging too favorably of the Administration, both of head and heart; we err in supposing that they were wise enough to shun the precipice down which they have fallen, and sufficiently honest and prudent not to barter away the interest, the wealth, the peace, the blood, and independence of this once great and highly favored nation, for a toy—a butterfly.

In this respect, and for this cause, we have erred, and are entitled to forgiveness. If we have thought more favorably of those who declared the war than the gentlemen are willing to admit they deserve, we will yield to their superior knowledge of the subject, and confess ourselves wrong.

One thing, sir, I ought to say: if the dictates of common sense, and the experience of mankind, will not enable us to judge what course the Administration would have steered, the consequences of the war show most conclusively what course they ought to have steered. For, what but defeat and disgrace have we experienced in all our attempts to conquer the Canadas? Except the little advantages we have recently gained, the war has been one continued series of abortive attempts at victory; and, before this honorable House and my country, I venture to prophesy, that for even these successes, we shall be compelled to pay, with severe interest. Depend upon it, sir, with such an army, visited with the dreadful retributions which sooner or later blast and wither that Government which dares to mock Omnipotence by violating the laws of God, and trampling under foot humanity, I say, sir, with such an army, enfeebled with sickness, and with a spirit broken, ambition quenched by poverty and nakedness; cudgelled and abused by the beardless, upstart subalterns, whose nod the soldier must obey; and with such a man at the head of that army, the idea of reducing the Canadas is as romantic as the conquest of giants was in the hero of La Mancha.

Mr. GASTON said, that when he entered the House that morning, he had no expectation of taking a part in this debate. He was perfectly conscious of the disadvantages under which he must appear, in attempting, without the benefit of previous reflection, an examination of the argument contained in the extraordinary harangue of the gentleman from Tennessee; an harangue evidently studied and elaborate. But as the question had been called for; as no other gentleman seemed disposed to occupy the floor; and as part of that argument demanded notice, he felt it his duty to claim the attention of the Chair for a few minutes. However unequal the contest, yet in the cause of truth, and of the best interests of his country, he could not hesitate to engage in it. Provided those were advanced, he was little solicitous as to the light in which he might appear.

The gentleman had occupied no inconsiderable portion of the time of the House, with invectives against those who had discouraged loans and enlistments. To the part of the country, said Mr. G., which I have the honor to represent, such invectives are without the possibility of application. With us loans and enlistments have been considered as acts purely voluntary, in which every individual has been left free to pursue his inclinations. Indeed, in these days of distress, few of us have been able to lend, and the temptations to enlistment have not been strong enough to carry off many beside those whom all are willing to part with.

The gentleman has also indulged himself in insinuations, where more seemed meant than met the ear, of a disposition to take the part of Great Britain, and of prepossessions in favor of the enemy. These, he has indeed said, were not designed to apply to any gentleman occupying a seat on this floor. My experience, sir, has been too limited to enable me to ascertain whether I owe this exemption to the gentleman's sense of justice, or whether I am to consider it as a mere form of parliamentary decorum. In this state of doubt, as to the precise meaning of the gentleman, I will content myself with saying, that any charge of partiality to the cause of the enemy, as contrasted with that of my country, so far as regards me, would be utterly untrue. The bare supposition of it is intolerable. It will not be deemed egotism, I trust, to add, that baptized an American in the blood of a martyred father; bound to my native land by every moral and natural tie that can fasten on the heart of man; with not one motive of interest, of passion, or prejudice, to seduce the loyalty of my affections; never can I separate myself from the cause of my country, however that cause may have been betrayed by those to whose care it was confided.

Without commenting on the delicacy of the course which the gentleman has in this respect pursued, its art and address are sufficiently obvious. It reminds me of the mode of escape which naturalists inform us is observed by the cuttle fish in time of peril. When his adversary is fast gaining upon him, and destruction seems inevitable, he muddies the water through which he glides, and finds safety in confusion. Thus it is with the gentleman from Tennessee. He would escape from this discussion; he would elude the inquiry, how far we owe this war to French imposition, by raising a tumult about British predictions and British arguments. But the stratagem cannot take. No gentleman will suffer himself to be diverted from the investigation which these resolutions fairly suggest; and such inquiry, deliberately pursued, must terminate in the discovery of the necessary, though melancholy truth.

Mr. G. remarked, that whatever might be the issue of the resolutions, he cordially congratulated the nation that they had been introduced. It was due to the national honor, always involved in the honor of the national agents—and it was due to the best interests of the country, that the mystery which enveloped this subject should be dissipated.

A formal authentic decree of the Government of France, bearing date the 28th of April, 1811, and purporting to be an absolute retraction of the Berlin and Milan decrees, was exhibited by that Government to our representative Mr. Barlow in May, 1812. On his expressing surprise at the decree, and its ancient date, the French Minister assured him that this decree had been communicated to his predecessor, Mr. Russell, and had been sent on to the French Ambassador at Washington, with orders to lay it before the President. This information from Mr. Barlow was given to this House at the close of its last session, in consequence of a call on the President for intelligence about our relations with France; and it came without any explanation, comment, or denial. On all hands it must be admitted, that a shameful fraud has been somewhere perpetrated. The reputation of the nation demanded that this fraud should be placed to the account of those who had committed it. Upon this imposture he, in his conscience, believed the war had turned. Nothing can be more important to the future safety of the people, than to learn how and whence this calamity had befallen them. Mr. G. declared himself, also, highly gratified with the liberal and manly course which had been pursued by the mover of these resolutions, and his honorable associates. The resolutions had not been introduced at an early day after the session, because of the wish that an opportunity would be taken or made, by the Administration or its friends, to give the desired intelligence without a call from this side of the House. It was notorious that the public voice demanded a communication. A general curiosity pervaded the country to learn how it was that this decree of 28th April, 1811, had remained unknown here until after the declaration of war, and unknown in England until it was too late, by a repeal of the Orders in Council, to prevent a war. The public sensibility was alive in requiring full assurance that the charge of the fraudulent concealment of this decree—a charge which the French Minister of Foreign Affairs had advanced against our Government and its agents, was not true. Under these circumstances it had been hoped that the task of seeking this information would not be thrown on those who, although they would yield to none in regard for the honor of the nation, or for the honor of its Government, as such could not be presumed to feel a very intense interest in the personal reputation of those who administered its affairs. Mr. G. declared, that for one he had indulged this hope, and had openly expressed it to gentlemen attached to the Administration. It was not until time had shown that nothing would be done from that quarter, that the resolutions in question were presented. The same liberal motives which had delayed their introduction, governed in the course which had been afterwards pursued. Day after day was given before the motion was called up, that all who doubted might examine into its propriety. And when the attention of the House was at length claimed to this subject, all discussion was purposely forborne on the part of the mover and his associates, (under the presumption that a mere call for information would not be resisted,) until such discussion had been rendered unavoidable, by the invitation and defiance of its opponents. Such conduct on the part of a minority, Mr. G. believed, was not often witnessed. It evinced a magnanimity which he was proud to behold, and which augured well to themselves and their country.

French Decrees.

It was far from Mr. G's intention to travel over the ground which had been occupied by his friends who preceded him, and especially by the honorable gentlemen from New York, who had addressed the House yesterday. While the impressions of their manly footsteps might yet be seen, he should be satisfied with removing the obstructions with which it had been attempted to conceal them. This investigation, it has been justly urged, is demanded by a regard for the character of our Government in the estimation of our own citizens, and of the world. In answer to this we are told its character needs no protection, it is too pure, too unsullied to be affected by any charge. Sir, this is the language of rash, blind confidence! A most important decree of the French Government, vitally affecting the commerce, the peace, the independence, of this nation, is hidden from the Legislature and from the world, for more than twelve months after its date. Our Ambassador requires the cause of this concealment, and he is told by the official organ of the Government of France, in substance, that there has been no concealment on their part; but that the suppression has in fact been on the part of our Executive, or his agent. This charge of fraud is stated explicitly in the correspondence of Mr. Barlow. If this accusation be in no way repelled, what inference will be drawn from the uninterrupted silence of the accused? Sir, your own citizens must doubt, and foreign countries will more than doubt, about the truth of the charge. It is not yet, I hope, a maxim of our Government that "the King can do no wrong." There is no officer known to our Constitution and laws who is to be presumed incapable of misconduct. When an imputation of foul crime is brought against any of them, and from an accuser of high rank, according to the usages of nations, it is emphatically due to his country that the charge should be repelled. A disposition without cause to suspect public men of criminal conduct, and to swallow with credulity all that can be alleged against them, is indeed ungenerous and illiberal. But the opposite extreme, a determination to believe everything right which is connected with authority, and to applaud without examination all that has been or may be done by the "powers that be," is the characteristic of servility and folly. Of this temper it has been truly said, that "it is the screen by which power is concealed in its gradual progress to despotism, its most dangerous, if not its only dangerous approach. And even when nothing worse than imbecility wields the reins, it is by this it is upheld in its course from blunder to blunder, until it converts national misfortunes into national ruin."

A position, said Mr. G., has been taken by the friends of the proposed resolutions, which has given great dissatisfaction to the advocates of the Administration, and against which all the force of assertion and of argument has been directed. No proposition can be more completely established. It is supported by evidence little short of demonstration. The proposition is this, that had the French repealing decree of the 28th April, 1811, been promulgated at the time of its date, or at any time before the fatal resolution had been taken, to plunge this once happy country into war, it would have averted this dire calamity. Gentlemen in vain attempt to put this question to rest, in vain forbid this position to be taken. It is taken, and it will be maintained with all the obstinacy of right, in the face of the nation, and in defiance of every effort that can be used to expel us.

It is not my design to proceed step by step through all the documents which are supposed to be connected with this subject. Few employments can be more stale, flat, and unprofitable, either to the speaker or to the hearer. Indeed, sir, however it may be with others, I am weary of documents. They are so multiplied as to involve every object in obscurity, and to afford to every man, who knows how to wrest a sentence from its plain meaning, a text on which to preach a political sermon, according to his own fancy. I am sick of these documents, because their perusal too plainly shows, what is not unfrequent in private controversies, that we have been written into a war. But it is necessary to take a rapid comprehensive view of the state of our foreign relations, and of our course of policy in regard to them, for a few years before the date of this suppressed decree. This will enable us to ascertain the effect which its promulgation would have produced.

The Berlin and Milan decrees were permanent parts of a gigantic system, invented by Napoleon for the destruction of his adversary. The avowed object of this system was to establish a code of maritime laws, in support of which every commercial nation was to be arrayed in a confederacy, whereof he was to be the Protector, Legislator, and Judge. Of this code the elementary principles were, that the neutral flag should protect all that it covered; that arms and munitions of war should alone be deemed contraband; that fortified places could alone be blockaded; and that no blockade was effectual which was not also a siege. Great Britain was to be deemed an enemy of the human race, and cut off from human intercourse, until she acknowledged the new Napoleon code. The nation that declined to accede to this confederacy, was viewed as the ally of Britain, and subjected to the most rigorous and barbarous usages of war. Her ships were burnt on the ocean, and confiscated in port; her property plundered wherever found; her citizens made prisoners, and her territories invaded.

Britain refused to acknowledge this code; and, professing to retaliate on France the consequences of her own insolence, issued orders prohibiting neutral intercourse with a part of the French dominions so long as France enforced these monstrous decrees. These she proudly declared should last while the decrees lasted. In the revocation of them she would proceed step by step with the repeal of the decrees. It is foreign from my present purpose to inquire how far the retaliatory plea had any foundation; or if founded, whether it went in justification, or mitigation only, of the attack on neutral rights. What was the ground taken by our Government? On this point there cannot be mistake. The celebrated report of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, of November, 1808, unquestionably approved by the Executive, and by both branches of the Legislature, for on it was founded the law of non-intercourse with France and Britain, shows it fully. France and Britain were viewed as equal aggressors on our rights. The wrongs of both must be resented, and equally resented, or the wrongs of neither. Any measure of hostility against one, either through the medium of commercial or of actual warfare, not levelled also at the other, was pronounced to be submission. I do not say that the ground taken was correct. On the contrary, I am convinced, that it was false in fact, and erroneous in principle. But it was the ground deliberately taken by the concurrent voice of every branch of the Government, solemnly proclaimed to the world as the true American ground, and which, in theory at least, has never yet been abandoned. The act of May, 1810, was an explicit re-assertion of the principles of the report of 1808. It refused to resent immediately the wrongs of either belligerent, but pledged the faith of the Legislature, (an idle rash, unconstitutional pledge!) to become the enemy of that one which should persist in injustice, after the other should have returned from the evil of her ways. If either should cease from the violation of our neutral rights, and, on three months' notice of the fact, her rival enemy should refuse to imitate the praiseworthy example, then by an interdiction of all trade with her ports, or in her productions, the obstinate foe was to be punished. This law afforded a fit opportunity for French juggling. The famous letter of the 5th of August, 1810, of the Duke of Cadore, purported to be founded upon it. This letter announced a revocation of the Berlin and Milan decrees, which were to cease to have effect on the first day of November following, upon one or the other of two conditions—a renunciation by Britain of her maritime doctrines, “her principles of blockade;” or an enforcement by America against Britain of the interdiction of intercourse.

This equivocal promise was pronounced by our Executive an actual repeal of the obnoxious decrees; and Britain was demanded, upon the fact of such repeal, to comply with her engagement, to revoke her orders alleged to be retaliatory. This demand was resisted upon the ground, that the latter, instead of repealing, re-affirmed the decrees, the sole objects of which were to compel Britain to renounce her maritime rights, or neutral nations to withhold communication from her. Facts were asserted, and brought forth on each side, in support of the respective constructions given to this Delphic letter. At this time, and during this conflict of expositions in the interpretation of the French Puzzle—a conflict which had it not been followed by consequences the most serious, would have been indeed ludicrous—let us suppose, that the repealing decree of April 28, 1811, had made its appearance, as by its date it ought to have done. It must have entirely changed the state of affairs. It must have silenced the controversy as to the construction of the infamous Cadore letter, while it established what was then the fact. It must have forever severed the fatal alliance which the President's proclamation had made between the law of May, 1810, and this pretended repeal of the decrees on the 2d of November. And, sir, whether it had been followed by a corresponding revocation of the British orders or not, it would, in all human probability, have prevented this calamitous war. Would it have been followed by a corresponding revocation of the British orders? It is not given to man to pronounce with certainty upon any event which has not happened; but, if it be possible to arrive at truth by inferring, from what did take place, what would have taken place, had the same causes been brought into earlier operation, there is no reason to doubt but that such a revocation would then have followed. This decree of the 28th of April, 1811, however insulting to the American Government in giving it the lie in the face of the world; and however, in other respects, the detestable reverse of what ought to have been desired, was a formal and absolute abrogation of the obnoxious edicts as regarded the United States. Under the hand of the Emperor, and with all the solemnities of a fundamental law of his Empire, it announced: "The decrees of Berlin and Milan are definitively, and to date from the first day of November last, considered as not having existed in regard to American vessels." Could there be any motive of interest, any suggestion of pride, to prevent Great Britain from thereupon declaring that, as these decrees were definitively withdrawn from American vessels, so, also, were her Orders in Council? So far from it, every inducement must have operated with her to adopt this course. She would find in the edict of the 28th of April a complete victory over the American Government as to the controversy whether France had theretofore repealed these decrees. It would have afforded to her one of the most desirable opportunities to contrast her good faith with French perfidy. If she regarded her honor, it would have urged to the measure; if she valued American trade, she would not fail to embrace the certain means of its restoration; if she cared for the friendship of America, she had it completely in her power to dissolve the bands which tied her to France. The President was bound, by the act of March, 1811, on which the French decree of the 28th April professed to be founded, to restore intercourse with Great Britain on the revocation of her orders; and no man was ignorant, much less the British Court, that a restoration of that intercourse must, and would have been followed by the resentment of the tyrant of France. And, do we not know that, as soon as this decree was made known to the British Government, it did occasion a corresponding revocation of the Orders in Council? I say, as soon, for, notwithstanding the objection that an interval of thirty days elapsed between the communication of this decree and the revocation of the orders, yet my estimable friend (Mr. GROSVENOR) has explained this circumstance to the conviction of scepticism itself; the Prince Regent was, in fact, without a Ministry. By the Constitution of that country, the monarch cannot act but through the intervention of his Ministers. As he is irresponsible to the law, for "he can do no wrong," he is at liberty to act only through those who are answerable for what is wrong. The first moment when a Cabinet could be had to deliberate on the French decree of April, 1811, produced the revoking order of the 23d of June of last year—an order which the President has himself declared is susceptible of explanations that render it satisfactory.

Since, then, a knowledge of this decree, in May, 1812, was immediately followed by a satisfactory revocation of the obnoxious orders, why are we to believe that a knowledge of it in May, 1811, would not have produced the same consequence? The gentleman from Tennessee undertakes to inform us, and for this purpose has commented with as much fidelity as is usual with most scholiasts on the Prince Regent's declaration on what he calls Lord Castlereagh's despatch, and on the correspondence of Mr. Monroe with the British Minister, Mr. Foster. These, in his judgment, clearly show that this would not have happened. I cannot, if I would, follow the gentleman through all these comments. My lungs already admonish me that I have spoken long, and there is yet a view of this subject which must not be overlooked. Permit me, however, to say that, whatever impression the circumstances referred to were then calculated to make, and with the lights then alone appearing, they fall infinitely short now of supporting the inference which the gentleman attempts to draw from them. The Prince Regent's declaration affords us not the slightest aid in the inquiry. It speaks only of a full and unconditional repeal of the decrees being followed by a full and unconditional revocation of the Orders. It intimates nothing as to the effect which would be produced on the orders by a repeal of the decrees, as it regarded one neutral only. And this was the explicit language of my friend from New York, notwithstanding the statement given of it by the gentleman from Tennessee. It is one of the proudest triumphs of Truth, that, to combat her with success, she must not be met upon her own ground. Is it strange that the declaration of the Regent is silent on this point? No, sir; it was to be presumed that the new maritime code of Napoleon would be adhered to or relinquished. If adhered to, the orders were to continue; if relinquished, they were to cease. The dispute between the United States and Great Britain was, as to the fact of the repeal or no repeal of the French decrees, and not whether the repeal was limited to America alone, or extended to all neutrals.

As to the despatch of Lord Castlereagh, none of us can pretend to know its contents; further than may be collected from the correspondence between Mr. Monroe and Mr. Foster. The former of these gentlemen asks the latter, (letter June 3d, 1812,) whether the recollection which he has of the import of Lord Castlereagh's despatch, in supposing it to differ from Mr. Foster's own letter of the 30th May, in the circumstance of declaring that the decrees must be repealed, not only against the United States, but against the world, before any revocation will be had of the Orders, be accurate or not? Mr. Foster assures him in answer, on the same day, that there is no difference between his letter and the despatch. This letter of the 30th May, unquestionably contains no such declaration. Let it be twisted as it may, it states nothing more than that a partial exemption from the penalties of the decrees, upon the condition of a co-operation in their object, could not entitle any neutral to claim a revocation of the British orders. It is an adherence to the ground originally taken—and which upon the plea of retaliation could not have been abandoned. But I agree with the gentleman from Tennessee in the sentiment that Foster's letter, of June 10th, does express the opinion that a repeal of the decrees as to America, would not entitle us to claim a revocation of the orders to the same limited extent. Now, sir, if this opinion of Mr. Foster can be viewed as founded on any special instructions, it would be entitled to great weight. But it is remarkable that no such pretence is advanced by Foster. He gives it merely as an opinion which he infers from the public declarations of his Government, justifying their orders, and avowing the grounds on which they would be revoked. From these, without the imputation of arrogance, any of us is as well enabled to draw the proper inference as Mr. Foster himself, and therefore any of us could claim to know with as much confidence what would be done by his Government, on the happening of an event which had not been specially provided for nor anticipated. That this is a correct view of the nature of the opinion given in this letter, appears from the very words of Foster, immediately following the sentence containing the opinion. "But, sir, to what purpose argue upon a supposed case, or upon a state of things not likely to occur?" It also appears from his subsequent declaration, in his letter of June 14th, in which he says, that "a full and unconditional repeal of the French decrees, as we have a right to demand it in our character of a neutral nation, shall be met with a revocation of the Orders in Council." An absolute withdrawal of the decrees, as regards the United States, would unquestionably have been a "full and unconditional repeal" in this sense and to the extent of our neutral claim.

One remark, sir, on the correspondence of Mr. Monroe and Mr. Foster ought not to be omitted. No man can examine it, without being sensible of the superior skill with which it was conducted on the part of the American Secretary; and in nothing is the superiority more manifest than in the management with which the British Minister is drawn in to give an answer to the abstract question of a supposed repeal by France of the decrees, so far as they affected America. Though seemingly conscious of the snare that was set for him, and more than once avoiding it, yet he is at length completely caught. A boy never twirled his top with more entire control than the Secretary turned Mr. Foster round his finger. While the contest as to the fact of a repeal of the French decrees was going on between them, and every day was adding a new argument to establish the negative, the celebrated report of the French Minister of Foreign Relations, to the Conservative Senate, of the 10th of March, 1812, made its appearance. This report so unequivocally contradicted the supposition that there had been any repeal of the decrees, that it was scarcely possible to carry on the argument longer. What was to be done? The war whoop had been sounded; the war passion had been roused, the war embargo had been imposed, and the war message communicated. To use the wretched culinary metaphor of the Committee of Foreign Relations, "the table had been spread, and the guests were all invited to the feast"—of blood. There was imminent danger of disappointment. With an art and an address worthy of a better cause and a nobler object, (a better cause than the upholding of Executive consistency, or concealment of the fatal delusions of every branch of the Government—a nobler object than a petty diplomatic advantage over a puny adversary,) it is contrived to shift the ground of controversy. Actually confounding, or pretending to confound, a mere exemption from the operation of the decrees, so long as we brought ourselves within the benefit of their provisions, with an unequivocal repeal of the decrees themselves, so far as affected us, the Secretary easily perplexes the British negotiator. Contriving to draw from him what may be construed into a declaration that such a repeal would not be followed by any revocation of the orders, he rejoices to be relieved from the now unnecessary inquiry, whether such a repeal had in fact occurred. There is now no further delay or impediment. Grace is invoked in due form, and the horrid banquet commences.

The gentleman from Tennessee cannot help his argument by any expressions in the order of the Prince Regent, of 23d June, repealing the obnoxious Orders in Council. It is very true that it pronounces that the tenor of the decree of the 28th April, 1811, does not satisfy the conditions upon which he had pronounced in his declaration of the 21st of April, 1812, that the orders should cease and determine—nor does it. A revocation of the orders as to all the world, was only to be consequent on a repeal of the decrees as to all the world. The declaration of April had been silent as to the effect of a repeal of the decrees limited to one nation. What would have been the effect, was to be collected from the spirit of the pledge given as to the retaliatory character of the orders, and of their ceasing, step by step, with the decrees on which they were founded. What was its effect this order manifested. It immediately produced such a revocation, as tended "to establish the intercourse between neutrals and belligerents, upon its accustomed principles"—those principles which the decrees and orders had temporarily impaired. That it would have produced the same effect at any antecedent moment, a candid inquirer can scarcely doubt. With every reason to believe, and not one to disbelieve it, incredulity is the offspring of prejudice.

But it is doubted whether a timely repeal of the Orders in Council would have prevented a war.

JUNE, 1813.

French Decrees.

H. OF R.

Sir, such a doubt cannot be removed by argument. He who indulges it will cherish it the more, because it is almost exclusively his own; and because it soars above the reach of argument. There is scarcely an intelligent man in the Union who does not know that the Orders in Council were the pivot on which the war turned. Had these orders been removed, and our full intercourse restored with Great Britain, the man would have been deemed insane who should have proposed a declaration of war. Thus, sir, the question on impressment was yet unsettled—and this is now trumpeted forth as the great cause of hostilities. Indeed, when the black catalogue of injuries was to be made out, it was not amiss to give this a conspicuous place in the inventory. But, we all know that this question had slept without any efforts to settle it since the rejection of Mr. Monroe's arrangement. And, after rejecting this arrangement, our Government could not have had the audacity or the guilt to plunge into a war about "seamen's rights," without an attempt on our part to secure them by negotiation.

Mr. G. said, there was another point of view in which the suppression of this repealing decree was of immense importance. Although it had not been followed by a revocation of the Orders in Council, its publication must have prevented war. Never, said he, can I forget the impression which the first appearance of this document made on my mind, and sure I am there is at least one honorable gentleman in this House who voted for the war, (and no doubt upon the best conviction of his understanding, and with the most upright motives,) who will not readily forget the impression which the first communication of this decree made on his mind. As soon as it met his view, on his way home from the very Congress in which war was declared, not in answer to any question, but from the spontaneous impulse of honest emotion, he exclaimed—"This was not known to the Government before the declaration of war." Is not the inference irresistible, that had it been known, in his opinion, at least, war would not and ought not to have been declared. Sir, could it have been, without utter infamy? We had taken our stand to treat both belligerents alike, until one should first cease from injustice—and on that event only had pledged ourselves to punish the other. Under a belief that France had so solemnly retracted her iniquitous decrees, and that we were bound by the obligations of honor to redeem our plighted faith, we waged a commercial warfare with England, which we afterwards changed for actual war. What does this decree tell you? Every word of it deserves notice:

"Seeing, by a law passed on the 2d March, 1811, the Congress of the United States has ordered the execution of the provision of the act of non-intercourse, which prohibits the vessels and merchandise of Great Britain, her colonies and dependencies, from entering into the ports of the United States; considering that the said law is an act of resistance to the arbitrary pretensions consecrated by the British Orders in Council, and a formal refusal to adhere to a system invading the independence of neutral Powers, and of their flag, we have decreed and do decree the following:

"The decrees of Berlin and Milan are definitively, and to date from the 1st of November last, considered as not having existed in regard to American vessels."

The very issuing of this decree proclaims that the Berlin and Milan decrees had not been theretofore repealed. It tells you, and it tells the world, that it is not a fact, as you have declared, that France has done the act which justified you on your own principles in making a distinction between her and Great Britain. It contemptuously holds you forth as having been cheated into a course of conduct which, agreeably to your own doctrines, was submission to France. It treats with scorn your pretension, that France had departed from her system towards you. It announces that you have abandoned your scheme of neutrality. It declares that you shall be relieved from the oppressive decrees in consequence of your law of March, 1811, and because the gracious arbiter of your fate deigns to view that as a sufficient act of resistance against his enemy—in other words, as a sufficient manifestation of your accession to his maritime confederacy. Sir, said Mr. G., my face burns when I venture even to ask, if this decree had been before you, could you have insisted on the policy of a war with Britain? In May, 1810, you could not select between the rival belligerents. In May, 1811, the only change in the account of your wrongs is an act of the meanest deception, and most outrageous insult, on the part of France. Would this have so changed the political balance as to have made you direct your hostility against her enemy. It would not—it could not have been so. However firmly I believe that it has pleased a chastening God to punish our sins by darkening the understandings of those who have governed in our Councils, yet I know there was yet an American spirit among them, which would have been called forth had this decree been presented to their view. Its promulgation would have disclosed the gulf which was yawning to devour us. Instinctive nature would have recoiled from destruction.

Yet, sir, this decree, the suppression of which has involved my country in war—this decree, of which our first knowledge is its communication to Barlow in May 1812—this very decree the French Government declare was duly laid before the proper Representatives of this nation both abroad and at home. The great object of these resolutions is to ascertain the truth or falsehood of these charges. When I reflect on the situation of those whom I represent on this floor, not the wealthy inhabitants of your cities, who in time of need can live luxuriously, upon the gains which they have amassed in the days of prosperity, but, in general, the plain industrious farmers of your country, once comfortable and happy, though never rich—when I consider the general embarrassment which prevails among them, and the new burdens which your tax bills are about to impose—when I think of the utter distress which has seized on that portion of my constituents who once gained a decent competence by laboring in their native forests, or by navigating their dangerous coast, or by mechanical pursuits connected with commerce—and recollect that all these calamities have sprung from a fatal war, which had its origin in a trick, a delusion, I should be a traitor to them if I did not aid with my efforts in discovering the authors of the fraud. It is due to our citizens that they should know how the nation has been betrayed into its calamities. However mortifying the acknowledgment, better, far better that they should learn that their Government has been the dupe of France, than that they should suspect it of having been an accomplice in her perfidy.

Sir, it is premature to pronounce an opinion before the desired information is given us. But as other gentlemen have not hesitated to declare theirs, and as forbearance on my part might be misinterpreted, I have no hesitation in expressing my belief, that the assertion of the Duke of Bassano is false. I do not think that the Executive could have been guilty of an act so detestably wicked as the wilful concealment of a document so all important to his country. And although I know nothing of Mr. Russell, our former Minister to France, I will not believe him guilty (without far better evidence) of such foul treason against the nation which he represented. I feel assured, that the result of the inquiry will prove, that the guilt, and the meanness, and the falsehood of this transaction have their origin in the Cabinet of Napoleon—that laboratory of frauds and calumnies. But while these are my hopes, and this my belief, I will not conceal my apprehensions. From the silence which has hitherto been observed by the Executive, when the occasion permitted and even required notice of the accusation—from the palliating tone in which the insolent decree has been spoken of as rather “exceptionable in its time and manner,” I fear that the honor of the Government and the interests of the nation have not been vindicated by repelling the insult, or by demanding an explanation of the complicated perfidy of France. If from a cautious, timid policy, or from any other cause, this course has been neglected, and it is the object of the last resolution to ascertain the fact, this House, I trust, springing immediately from the people, and animated by the feelings which pervade the nation, will not hesitate to evince their sensibility to its wrongs and indignities—their scorn of calumny, and detestation of treachery, even though they proceed from an Imperial source, or are allied with hypocritical professions of “love for Americans.”

Mr. HANSON rose in reply to Mr. GRUNDY.—He said he would again ask the attention of the House as long as his strength would enable him to keep the floor, whilst he set forth those views which directed his mind upon the present inquiry. He equally regretted, that gentlemen should have dipped so deeply into the documents connected with this very plain and simple question under discussion, and the necessity he was under of replying, in a particular manner, to the gentleman from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY.) The assertion made by that gentleman, the sentiments he uttered, and the monstrous doctrines he advanced, rendered such a reply unavoidable, if indeed he could ever be disposed to avoid doing his duty. Desirous as he had been from the beginning, to confine the discussion within its proper metes and bounds, with the hope of having presented to the people a simple, plain proposition, he would not have suffered himself to be led into a tedious investigation, but that it seemed altogether fitting for him to reply to the member from Tennessee.

One of Mr. HANSON's reasons for avoiding the course pursued in the debate, of opening upon the House a deluge of documentary evidence, was, if possible, to deprive gentlemen, like the member from Tennessee, of an opportunity to display the lawyer-like dexterity, and a characteristic skill and cunning, for which he understood the member stood unrivalled and pre-eminent in the highly civilized, polished and refined State which honored the House with his presence here. As it was however, Mr. H. did not regret the course that had been taken, because it had been the means of placing the gentleman from Tennessee in the light Mr. H. was most pleased to behold him; of exhibiting him in those native colors, dressed in which he would be best recognised by those who best knew him—of displaying him in his true character, of a bitter reviler of one of the great parties in this country, and the apologist of France.

[Here the SPEAKER called to order; saying, the gentleman from Maryland could not proceed in such a course of argument—that the epithet “cunning” was not proper to be applied to a member of that House, still more was it out of order to use the words “apologist of France.”]

Mr. HANSON asked if the same latitude of debate allowed to the gentleman from Tennessee would not be extended to him. The SPEAKER replied “certainly.” If it is not, said Mr. H., I must get at the gentleman in some other way, in the course of the argument. Mr. GRUNDY rose to explain: Mr. H. said he had the floor and meant to keep it; there would be an opportunity to reply.]

Mr. HANSON proceeded—It struck me, Mr. Speaker, with considerable force, and I have no doubt other gentlemen on this floor thought it not less remarkable, that although the inquiry embraced in the resolutions related exclusively to the perfidy and falsehood of the French Government, presuming innocence at home, after occupying the floor full one hour by the clock, during which time innumerable insinuations were made, when not one fact could be substantiated, the gentleman has not uttered one word of reproach, has not suffered a breath of improbation to escape his lips against this France. On the contrary, in the very breath that he impugns the principles and arraigns the patriotism of the best and wisest men that adorn our country, he himself seeks to shroud and smooth over the enormities of the French Government.

The gentleman spoke of our laboring in our new vocation to sow distrust among the people, and to throw obstructions in the way of the Administration, thus weakening the arm of our own Government and strengthening that of the enemy. If that gentleman will only turn his eyes inward and examine his own heart, if he will look at home, he may come to the conclusion, that our new vocation is at least as praiseworthy and honorable as his old vocation. If I am not mistaken, sir, this is the fiery, furious gentleman, who, during the war session, went about beating up to arms and enlisting recruits, crying out, follow me ye of stout hearts, let the faint-hearted now leave us! That gentleman, Mr. Speaker, (pointing to Mr. GRUNDY,) it should be known, can set examples in and out of this House, which, I confess, it would require a very stout heart to imitate; which, with perfect honor, might be shunned, nor should that heart be denounced as faint which should pause, palpitate, and shudder at the bare idea of such imitation. The gentleman may labor in his vocation without danger of interruption from me in his suits or pursuits. But who are the friends of the "fast anchored isle," (and I hope she will long remain fast anchored; I trust in God, she will not be loosed from her moorings, at least, until the colossal power of France is at an end—we have nothing to disguise or conceal upon this subject,) that he accuses of weakening the arm of Government, and aiding the enemy? Think you, Mr. Speaker, that the honorable gentleman alluded to would suffer by a comparison of public and private virtues with the member from Tennessee? I will not do irreverence to the gray hairs of the venerable and exalted characters (pointing to Mr. PICKERING, just before him, and meaning also Mr. BENSON and Mr. STUART) whose lives have been dedicated to the service of their country—in whose bosoms the flame of patriotism still burns bright, and cannot be extinguished by the snow above—I will not disparage their fair virtues by any such comparison. No, sir, the reputation of the models of political excellence and moral worth that we delight to honor, rests upon a base of adamant. They are lifted high up above the reach of obloquy, or crimination from that quarter.

The gentleman, in his zeal to cast odious suspicion on the friends of peace, has said the honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) "out-Herods Herod, out-Castlereaghs Lord Castlereagh," when, by his own exhibition, the gentleman from Tennessee out-Bobadils Bobadil, and out-Bassanos Bassano. At the same time he loudly calls upon the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire no longer to support his resolutions by proxy, when he himself was made a mouthpiece by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.)

The gentleman charges the minority with being the cause of the war, said Mr. H. Did he mean to say, that they had been laughed or ridiculed into the measure? This was paying a left-handed compliment indeed to the understanding and high political attributes of the men that rule the country, as well as to his own sense and judgment. The truth was, they had waded so far, it was better to go on than turn back. They had so completely committed themselves in their bullying system—their policy of addressing themselves to the fears of England—that, according to their own misconceived notions of consistency and honor, they were obliged to go on, all retreat being cut off—no avenue being left open for escape. Mr. H. here spoke of a self-created committee of Congressmen who called on the President and required him to send the House a Message recommending war. He said the first demand was unsuccessful, but the second succeeded; when he was given to understand that his reelection depended upon his recommending war at once. Mr. H. inveighed in strong terms against such a state of things, when a Presidential election was made to depend upon a recommendation of war.

In answer to the doctrine of moral treason, Mr. H. spoke of the Western insurrection, and contrasted the conduct of Federalists now with that of the Democrats then. Although groaning and sweating under the pressure of the privations and afflictions induced by an unrighteous and wasteful war, they had never combined to rebel against the Government, and point their bayonets against their own country. They claimed nothing but the privilege, which was the birthright of every man in this free country, of opposing the measures of Government in a Constitutional way. He spoke indignantly of the conduct of Gallatin in that insurrection, who had been so well rewarded, and was known to have been the very soul of the Government for many years past, and was now sent to Russia to intrigue on the Continent of Europe. After speaking of the conduct of the present ruling party during the French war, he again assailed the slavish Asiatic doctrines advocated as a means of carrying on the war. None but a helot or a serf could harbor in his bosom such hideous, deformed principles, and he who did entertain them was unworthy of being a member of a free community, much less of having a seat on this floor. He had not the patience or philosophy to treat this subject as it might be treated by others. Even in the district he represented, distinguished as it was for lofty and correct sentiments, some men of reputed sense were so borne down by clamor, or terrified by the threatening aspect of affairs, as actually to ask the opinion of a lawyer how far it was lawful to oppose war, now that it was declared. Such was the industry and success with which the doctrine of moral treason, passive obedience, and non-resistance, was disseminated, wherever agents could be found base enough to do such jobs for their employers.

There was no way of terminating this war, if the House, who held the purse strings of the nation, would grant the supplies to carry it on. The House owed all its importance and authority to the power of the purse. They alone held the purse strings of the nation. To this feature of the Constitution, they should cling as the floating plank on the ocean—as the rock of their salvation. It was in the power of the House to terminate this bloody and disastrous contest with a nation willing to be at peace with us; and that man was indeed morally guilty of treason, who would furnish the means of ruining his country under the impressions entertained by the minority of this war. With the conviction written on his mind in strong and indelible characters, Mr. H. would feel like a traitor, if he aided in supplying the means to bring the Republic to a premature but inevitable fate, if the war was continued another year, of which there could be no doubt, as far as the actions and the hearty wishes of the dominant party and their leaders were a criterion to judge by.

Mr. H. said, that nothing but the spirit, perseverance, and patience, of the Federal party, had saved the nation so long from falling into the fangs of France. They cleaved closer and closer to the country as her danger increased. But for their unconquerable attachment to liberty, their ardent and unintermitting exertions to save the nation from the greatest of all sublunary miseries, years ago we should have fallen into the snare set for us by the fell destroyer of nations. By a slow but sure process, said he, has the existing state of intense suffering, alarm, discontent, and danger, been brought upon this people. As direct and as constant as the vane upon the steeple points to the quarter whence the wind blows, and shifts with every adverse breeze, as faithfully as the needle designates the North, have the measures of the present incumbent of the palace and his predecessor and preceptor pointed to this war. True, they had occasionally varied and shifted their measures in matter of form as circumstances required—now relaxing, now bracing and invigorating their system—but the political barometer never deceived us. The State vane always showed whether the wind set from Mount Monticello or Gallia's shore, which the weatherwise considered as one and the same thing, in regard to the effect upon the political season. Yes, sir, said he, as regularly as the compass and the heavens conducted the great mariner Cook around the globe, and the breeze propelled his bark along, have the predominating minds of the ruling party, driven on by headstrong passion, have the master magicians behind the scenes, so beautifully dizzened to amuse the eye and divert the judgment, conducted this deluded people, like the alluring night lamp, into swamps, through briars, thickets, and quagmires. But to foretell a year ago the disastrous events that have passed in review before us, in almost "one long unbroken funeral train," betrayed a distempered imagination. A peculiar proclivity to error was perceived in all our speculations, and a treasonable excitement of false alarms was charged against those who foresaw and were bold enough to foretell abortion and disgrace in all the transcendent schemes of glory, conquest, and aggrandizement, engendered in the disordered brains of their authors. Indeed, whoever had the hardihood to venture a prediction of mis-carriage, was assailed with the ready argument of minions and pensioners; the cry of tory was thrown into his face like a bowl of cold water. The lamp post, the guillotine, or the gallows, was a punishment scarcely ignominious enough for the man who dare oppose this most righteous, honorable, and profitable war!

Mr. H. here proceeded to show, that the war had no other foundation but a false and mistaken data; in a word, that it was bottomed on a falsehood, and therefore the minority should not be strung up as moral traitors, or have their throats cut for opposing it in a Constitutional way—unlike the opposers of the French war of 1798—the only way in which it had been opposed, and he hoped would continue to be opposed, with a zeal and constancy commensurate with the great and salutary objects to be attained.

He began with the celebrated "triangular report," as it was called, of 1808, which assumed the alternative of war, embargo, or submission, declaring that "war with one of the belligerents would be submission to the other." He asserted, (and called upon gentlemen then in the House, who were of the Committee of Foreign Relations in 1808, to contradict him if they could undertake to do so,) that the report mentioned proceeded from the pen of the President, was not the production of the committee, but was handed over by the Executive to one of the heads of department, who handed it to the committee. Of course the stand taken was by the Executive; it was their act, and they were thus pledged to the United States and to the two great belligerents of Europe to preserve a strict neutrality, a faithful impartiality towards them, &c.

He then cited the law of May, 1810, holding out the same terms to France and England, and empowering the President to suspend the law of non-intercourse in favor of either that should accede to our offer, and enforce it against the Power that should decline an arrangement—the "fact" of such repeal to be declared by proclamation. He explained how and wherefore the word "fact" was introduced into the non-intercourse law of 1810. Because it was thought, by those opposed to the arrangement with Mr. Erskine, that the Executive had transcended his powers, by proclaiming the orders to be repealed, when the repeal was to take effect in futuro. The law was then construed by its makers as bearing no such meaning, but to require an unconditional repeal, to take effect at the time. He would say nothing of the manner in which both Houses endeavored to contravene that arrangement, before its disavowal in England, and thus breaking the plighted faith of Government; but it was certain the word "fact" was introduced in the new law, in order more clearly to define its meaning, and to guard against a second departure from its spirit and letter. Nevertheless, the Duke of Cadore's letter of August 5, 1810, was taken as a repeal, coming within the strict meaning of the act, although the repeal was therein made to depend upon a condition precedent, and not an actual bona fide repeal, as contemplated by the law. What were those conditions? That England should repeal her Orders in Council, abandon her new principles of blockade, or the United States should cause her rights to be respected: in other words, take part against "the common enemy," which was finally done, before an authentic act of repeal was published by France and presented to England. The French Government had itself furnished the proof of this fact, out of which grew the present resolutions.

A word or two, said Mr. H., about these new principles of blockade. According to the Napoleon code, a blockade to be legal, must be of a fortified place, and there must be an investiture by sea and land. According to the same code, a ship is declared to be an extension of the territory, a floating colony; to visit or search, therefore, is an invasion of the territories of a neutral, and an act of war. For not repelling such invasion, France chastises us by a general order to her corsairs, to sink, burn, and destroy; while in port, the douaniers seize or confiscate all within the reach of the Imperial robber. So that Bonaparte will sink our territory and burn our colony, because we do not resist by war the right of visit and search, legally exercised by his rival! Oh, most just, merciful, and loving ally!

Mr. H. said, when the Duke of Cadore's letter was first published in this country, not one man in a hundred supposed for a moment, that the President would take that letter as coming within the meaning of the law of May, 1810, because its express proviso was palpably inadmissible, being a condition precedent, and not a condition subsequent. He likewise asserted, upon authority which he deemed altogether good, that the President himself, when he first received the Duke's letter, pronounced it "jesuitical," and expressed himself in terms authorizing the belief, that he would not accept of it as coming within the terms of the law of May, 1810. However, notwithstanding this, and the undeniable evidence upon the face of the letter itself, to the amazement of all discerning honest men, Mr. H. well recollected to his own utter astonishment, on the 2d of November, 1810, the President did issue his proclamation declaring the fact of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, on the first of the same month and year—that is, that they were repealed the day before, according to the provisions of our law of non-intercourse. Now was drawn the strong line of demarkation between the two great parties in this country. Each took its decided stand, and bottomed its support or opposition to Government upon the truth or falsehood of this proclamation. We, the minority, contended, that there had been a positive violation of a plain law to favor France and embroil us with England—that a palpable juggle had been practised to induce a state of insurmountable repulsion in our relations with one belligerent, as a manifestation of our partiality to the other, and finally, with the view to connect our destinies to those of France. You, the majority, contended, that the President had only discharged a ministerial duty, doing nothing more than the law required of him, and in doing which he had no discretion to exercise.

To say nothing of the spirit of prophecy with which it was solemnly proclaimed to-day, that the decrees were bona fide and in "fact" repealed yesterday, I ask what was the fact? how has it turned out in evidence? Were we, the minority, as roundly asserted, in the wrong; or were you, the majority, ab initio, in the wrong, and have you continued in the wrong ever since? What says the evidence in the case? On the 28th of April, 1811, the Emperor promulgates his decree, antedated or not, it is immaterial, which commences thus:—"Seeing by the report of our Minister, &c., that the United States have passed a law of resistance, &c., we, Napoleon, &c., do decree, &c." What law of resistance? The March law of 1811, which superseded the false proclamation, and made that proclamation the only evidence of the repeal in the courts of law. So that Administration sought to entrench themselves behind the assumption of the fact, that the decrees were repealed in November, 1810, and that the law of March, 1811, "the law of resistance to England," was a consequence of that repeal; while on the other hand, our good friend, Bonaparte, officially declares, and produces the very repealing decree itself to remove all doubt, that the repeal was a consequence of the law of resistance. To aggravate the wrong and insult, he solemnly declares, through his Minister of State, that the repealing decree had been communicated to Mr. Russell and Mr. Serrurier about the time of its date, in order that it might be laid before this Government. It is this collateral fact of communication that these resolutions are meant, perhaps in vain, to establish. Were we right and you wrong? The evidence is before the world, and the best and only witness to the fact, the Emperor himself, by publishing his decree, proves the rectitude of our course, and the fallacy of all your positions. It proves the proclamation to have been false, the law of March to have been unjust, as predicated (to use the fashionable phrase) upon a falsehood; and it proves that every step since taken towards this war was in our own wrong, contrary to truth, justice and honor—it proves that the war has no other foundation to rest on than an undeniable authenticated falsehood. The war, therefore, deserves and can be distinguished truly by no other appellation than an unnecessary, unjust, and unrighteous war, for opposing which we are moral traitors! All the gentleman's reasoning, (Mr. Grundy) therefore, drawn from Mr. Monroe's and Mr. Foster's correspondence, is of no avail, and merits no reply.

To strengthen my positions, I will introduce another piece of testimony, from a witness altogether unexceptionable, the late Secretary of State, than whom none, save the President himself, stood higher in the estimation of the dominant party, and whose honor was guarded with a punctilious delicacy, amounting almost to adoration, as manifested by the dismissal of Mr. Jackson. What says this witness? I am afraid, by undertaking to repeat his testimony, I shall weaken and adulterate his precise and energetic language, and will therefore give his own words:

"It is within the recollection of the American people, that the members of Congress, during the last session, were much embarrassed, as to the course most proper to be taken with respect to our foreign relations, and that their embarrassments proceeded principally from the defect in the communications to them as to the views of the Emperor of the French. To supply this defect was the great desideratum. At a critical period of their perplexities, the arrival at Norfolk of an Envoy Extraordinary from France was announced. Immediately thereon all their proceedings touching our foreign relations were suspended. Their measures, as avowed by themselves and as expected by the nation, were then to be shaped according to the information, that might be received from Mr. Serrurier, especially, as he necessarily must have left France long after the all-important first day of November. Upon his arrival at Washington, and immediately after he had been accredited, knowing, as I did, the impatience of Congress and of my countrymen, I lost no time in having with him a conference. This conference I concluded by stating that I would take the liberty of addressing to him a note propounding the several questions, that I had just had the honor of putting to him in conversation, and that thus by his answer I should be enabled to lay before the President, with the utmost precision, his communications to me. I accordingly, immediately prepared the following draught of a letter, and considering the President's sanction a matter of course, I had it, in due official form, copied by the appropriate clerk. But waiting on the President with it, and after having reported to him verbally the result of the conference, I was, to my astonishment, told by him that it would not be expedient to send to Mr. Serrurier any such note. His deportment, throughout this interview, evinced a high degree of disquietude, which occasionally betrayed him into fretful expressions. Having in view nothing but the dignity of the Government, and the prosperity of my country, and, overlooking his peevishness, I entreated him, but in a manner the most delicate, not to withhold from Congress any information that might be useful to them at so momentous a juncture."

To give its full and proper force to Mr. Smith's evidence, a short notice of some interesting and important circumstances attending the introduction and final adoption of the March law of 1811 will be necessary. The gentleman who was Chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations at that time, is now a member of this House, and is in his seat. I say, then, as well as I remember, (correct me if I am wrong,) he introduced the law of March, 1811, just as Mr. Serrurier's arrival was announced. As soon as the Minister's arrival in Washington was known, he withdrew his bill, as understood at the time, to proceed wittingly, and to allow time to ascertain from the new Minister fresh from France, whether the decrees of Berlin and Milan were actually repealed, as assumed and proclaimed by the Executive. The inference would be drawn by the public, if, after allowing due time to learn the result of the conferences between the Secretary of State, the bill was again reported, that the result of such conference was favorable, and removed all doubt of the truth of the proclamation. If not again reported, the conclusion would necessarily be drawn, that the information extracted from Mr.

Serrurier was unfavorable. What was the result? Recur to the testimony given by Mr. Smith, and all doubt is removed. In this state of things what did the Committee of Foreign Relations? The Chairman again introduced the law of resistance against England, bottomed upon the asserted repeal of the decrees and the President's proclamation, which itself rested upon what is now established to be a juggle of France—an undeniable untruth. The nation of course did infer that Mr. Serrurier had fully satisfied the Administration of the repeal of the decrees. There were those, to be sure, (Mr. H. was among the number,) who never for a moment changed their opinion, but the many continued under the delusion until Mr. Smith's disclosures burst upon the nation, aroused general indignation, and struck with amazement and horror every man whose mind was open to conviction. Nevertheless, the Administration proceeded with a steady step to their point of destination, and finally plunged the country into this most ruinous, calamitous war, which has filled the nation with grief and mourning, and brought us to the verge, if not the gulf, of national bankruptcy. They rushed on blindfolded till they were so far advanced as not to have the power of preventing this people from being sucked into the vortex, which had well nigh swallowed up the liberties of the world, and but for the memorable and glorious events which have opened a new era to the nations of the earth, would have sealed the doom of this rising empire.

Mr. H. said, he feared the House were now severely suffering from the wide range taken in this debate, which he himself had protested against but a day or two before, desirous as he was of confining the attention of the House to the simple subject of inquiry, whether Mr. Madison or the Duke of Bassano was guilty. He could not too often repeat how desirable it was to pin down public attention to the point, whether the heinous offence imputed to our Chief Magistrate was false; and whether he had the independence and spirit to prove it so, or preferred pocketing the outrageous insult, to encountering the ire of Bonaparte.

It was proper here to notice an argument much dwelt upon by the Treasury side of the House—that the communication to Congress of the French repealing decree would not have prevented the war—nor was there any reason to believe England would repeal her Orders if the French repealing decree had been communicated to her. To which I can offer no better answer than this: she did repeal, so soon as the deranged state of the Ministry would permit, and in less than a month, or thereabouts, from the time Mr. Russell handed in the decree. But the argument of the gentlemen supports the presumption of the truth on this ground. What did it prove? Precisely what the minority have all along and invariably maintained—that you were so bent upon this war, as hardly to desire a pretext for engaging in it; you were resolved to wage it let what might happen. Had Great Britain repealed her Orders, which were the sole avowed cause of the war, she would have been taken up on the ground of impressment, though totally abandoned in the arrangement with Erskine. That point settled, the new principles of blockade would have remained to be adjusted; even this settled, restitution of property would have remained as ample cause of war with those who desired it. As England receded we have always advanced, even to the point of treading on her toes. One concession would be followed up by demanding another, and, with the men at our head who now govern us, war was inevitable, sooner or later, and must be continued, or the natural alimient of Democracy is withheld, and it pines away and dies. A treaty with England was always deemed tantamount to a declaration of war with France, and it was notorious that the late President, and author of all the evils endured by the country, frequently declared that "he wanted no treaty with England;" this, too, while negotiation was carried on with every appearance of sincerity. The whole secret lies here; it was thought England must be conquered; Bonaparte would bestride the globe, and we were for making early terms in the very manner of all those States on the Continent, that suffered most because most obsequious, supple, and submissive. In short, the elements of which the ruling party is composed, require a constant state of excitement and irritation to be kept up against England, lest the party disunite and is overthrown.

It remains for me, said Mr. H., to account for the cause of the falsehood, if a falsehood, told by Bassano, although it is conclusive, on the face of the correspondence, that at least one palpable lie has been told by him. I will prove, by his own words, that Mr. Barlow very modestly requested the Duke to tell a lie to answer the purpose of the Executive. In the most humiliating, degrading, and supplicating tone, upon his knees almost, he prays the Duke, in May, 1812, to publish a decree, declaring that the Berlin and Milan Decrees were repealed in November, 1810; and thus to legalize the false proclamation, and give to it the quality of truth, which it wanted from the beginning; thus dexterously to slide under us again the popular ground which had been slipped from under the Administration by the Duke of Cadore's juggle. Well, Monsieur, always courteous, ever accommodating, like a true-bred Frenchman, being importuned to lend Mr. Barlow one lie for his purposes, and those of his employer, liberally resolves to tell two lies, both of which, however, though caught at by Mr. Barlow, as a proof of his great address and influence with the French Minister, add to the difficulty and disgrace of Government. The antedated decree appears, and behold! it gives the lie direct to Mr. Madison's proclamation, (never to this day recalled in language "becoming the occasion,") establishes the injustice of the law of March, 1811, and the unrighteousness of this war. The other lie, as we hope it will turn out, is, that the decree was in proper time communicated to Mr. Russell and Mr. Serrurier, to be laid before this Government. Take it altogether, never was such aggravated wrong and injustice, such outrageous insult before submitted to. Here are the extracts from Mr. Barlow's letters. On the 1st of May, 1812, Mr. Barlow writes to the Duke of Bassano in these words:

"It is much to be desired that the French Government would now make and publish an authentic act, declaring the Berlin and Milan Decrees, as relative to the United States, to have ceased in November, 1810, declaring that they have not been applied, in any instance, since that time, and that they shall not be so applied in future."

This is admitting that no "authentic" repeal had before taken place; and to ask the Duke in 1812 to declare now, May 1st, 1812, that a repeal took place at that date; and to "make now," and publish a decree to that effect, was to be sure a very modest request, though it was all-important to ask and have it granted, to make that which was false in November, 1810, appear to have been true in 1812. Mr. Barlow succeeds in his request so far as to get the decree, but it dates the repeal of the French obnoxious edict in April, 1811, instead of November, 1810. Take Mr. Barlow's own words. I will now read an extract, said Mr. H., from Mr. Barlow's letter to Mr. Monroe, of May 12, 1812:

"When, in the conversation above alluded to (with Bassano,) the Duke first produced to me the decree of 28th April, 1811, I made no comment on the strange manner in which it had been so long concealed from me, and probably from you. I only asked him if that decree had been published. He said no; but declared it had been communicated to my predecessor here, and likewise sent to Mr. Serrurier, with orders to communicate it to you."

It cannot be overlooked that these despatches were not communicated to Congress until almost a year after the date of Barlow's letter containing the information, instead of being promptly and voluntarily communicated, as containing nothing that it was desirable to conceal. It is also remarkable that, when communicated, not a word of explanation or contradiction is contained in the President's Message. He merely sends the declaration of Bassano, which is thus impliedly admitted to be correct because not denied. Mr. H. said guilt lies between them, and illustrated by the case of robbery or murder that must have been committed by one of two persons only. The innocent man would insist upon a search or trial, while conscious guilt would involuntarily bring the hand of the other over his pocket, and make him anxious to hush up the affair. As an American, Mr. H. was anxious to have the matter definitively settled, and the character of the Government vindicated, if the guilt was on the other side of the water. He contended, that all the blood, treasure, and national character lost in this war, would have been saved, by the exhibition of the document, the concealment of which was imputed to Mr. Madison by the French Minister, as was supported by strong presumptive evidence. Mr. H. said, from the time and manner of the promulgation of the French decree, and its being promulgated at all, there was cause to suspect that the French Government knew the period, or thereabouts, when war would be declared. Certainly, it being the avowed object of France to involve us in a war with England, after so long denying us justice, and neglecting to repeal her decrees, she would do nothing that would be the means of accommodating our disputes with England. Upon the whole, she had pretty precise data furnished her to regulate her measures by. For instance, the embargo of April 1st, 1812, was laid for ninety days, and was declared to be the prelude of war. From the 1st of April to the 10th May, allowed ample time for the intelligence to be carried to France, and from the 10th May, the date of Bassano's communicating the repealing decree to Mr. Barlow, to the 18th June, there was more than time enough, with the prevailing winds at that season, to bring the repealing decree to this country. Now it never has been satisfactorily explained why the war was declared before the ninety days, the limitation of the embargo, had expired. If the repealing decree came to hand in time to prevent the war, this accounts for the haste, because the Wasp had been despatched from France to England, and it was reasonable to expect, and it was expected, that a corresponding repeal would take place in England, and arrive here before the expiration of the embargo, and thus would this war have been averted. But no, the measure was precipitated, when a few weeks, at all events, would have brought us the repeal of the Orders in Council. Time alone can develop these things, though accident may give us earlier information, and exhibit the whole transaction, mysterious as it now is, to the world.

Under all circumstances, Mr. H. wondered how the people were carried along by the party in power, who always contrived to drown the voice of reason, and to bear down their adversaries by clamor. His wonder somewhat ceased, when he heard that the people, in the section of the country from which came the gentleman who last addressed the House yesterday, never heard, until the last Spring, that there had been any such thing as Orders in Council. Such a mass of ignorance could be led by the nose anywhere, or moulded into any shape that their leaders pleased.

Mr. H. would return once more to the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. Grundy,) whom he was not yet willing to leave.

He observed it was a remark made by one of the greatest, best, and most consistent statesmen of this or any other age, that "if any one criterion more than all the rest, distinguished a wise and prudent Government, from an Administration weak and improvident, it was this, well to know when and in what manner to surrender that which it was impossible to keep." Let this maxim be regarded in the present case. It applies to individuals as well as Governments, and they may find their account in respecting the experience of Edmund Burke. I know, said Mr. H., a deaf ear will not only be turned to this advice, but it may be met with sneers and ridicule. I know sir, it is not in the nature of imbecility and its concomitant obstinacy to benefit by experience, or to acknowledge any other influences, or yield to any other impulses than the passion of the moment. They never draw lessons of wisdom from adversity; for folly is sure to be rendered obdurate by misfortune. You find in private life beings of this description, perverse and headstrong in proportion to the uniformity of their failures and disappointments. Like mules, they plant their feet in the ground, and can neither be led nor driven. Once overreached and pursued by misfortune, they plunge deeper and deeper into difficulty; they will multiply their desperate adventures, from some ten, twenty, to an hundred fold. It is a most desperate gambling policy they pursue, a policy which can alone be likened unto gambling, where the unfortunate adventurer doubles and redoubles his risk, upon the plan of shooting another arrow in the same direction to bring back that which is lost.

The gentleman from Tennessee has said much of British influence, in connexion with his doctrine of moral treason. Before he takes the mote from our eye, let him pluck the beam from his own. Let him judge not, lest he be judged. But, among the leading prominent causes of this war, that of particular foreign predilections and partialities; that of French influence, is never adverted to, but an instant ferment, a flame is blown up in this House, threatening to devour all obnoxious to its fury. Why, truly, sir, said Mr. H., the wonder with me is, that any doubt or delicacy should be felt upon that subject. It is matter of historical record, the annals of all time show it, from the days of the Cæsars down to those of your Napoleons, that all nations, a concomitantibus, ex visceribus rei, have had their foreign partialities, their favorites, their allies. I know not that human nature has undergone any such changes as to forbid or refute the supposition of a particular foreign leaning in the councils of our country, for nothing is more natural or easier accounted for. Is not human nature the same in this hemisphere, that it is in Europe? and does not the gentleman know that Holland had her Schimmelpenninck, Austria her Cobentzel, Sweden her old doting treacherous Duke of Sudermania, and Spain her Prince of Peace? At different periods, every nation of Europe, even England once during the Stuart dynasty, has avowed, has not pretended to deny or conceal, an attachment and subserviency to France. And yet, sir, there can be no question, had any one presumed to suspect Godoy on the very day he sold his country, and the wages of treason were paid, his head would have been the forfeit for such suspicion, if within the traitor's reach. So sure is it that tyrants and wicked men, that the guilty, are always most cruel, most implacable, most relentless and sanguinary. They seek to cover their crimes by the effect of terror, rage, and blood. No nation felt this French influence, or more candidly avowed it in her acts, than immortal Russia. Some of her best citizens remained almost to the last under this fatal, unnatural delusion. But she saw her error ere it was too late. She saw the abyss yawning before her, and perceived there was no salvation but by breaking up her French connexions. And the grateful acknowledgments of the good and wise of every clime have ascended to the Throne of Grace for her sudden and miraculous deliverance; that she has emancipated Europe, and rescued these States from the awful calamities impending over them from the grave dug for their independence. It is a reflection at which we may well weep, while the poor Cossack of the Don, on the borders of the "frightful climate," was pouring out his life's blood in the cause of humanity, American blood was streaming on the frontiers of Canada. While Napoleon was carrying on "a contest for the Government in Spain," our restrictive energies were withholding from the betrayed patriots our surplus produce.

[Mr. H., being completely exhausted, abruptly concluded, finishing his course of argument.]

Mr. MONTGOMERY rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker, I have risen to give a concise view of the reasons which have determined me to vote against the resolutions under consideration. Whenever I am made to believe, that information sought for by gentlemen, is necessary in order to form a correct opinion as to the course to be pursued in respect to any matter proper to be acted on by this House, I will heartily join in calling for it; and on the present occasion, if I could be convinced that the information sought for would prove that the war against Great Britain was unjust, that we are seeking to wrest from her something to which by the principles of national law she is justly entitled, I would join in the call, and would take such measures as would show that we now abandoned our pretensions and desired peace. But, sir, I cannot take this view of the subject.

I have reflected on these resolutions with a view of discovering whether the information sought for could form the basis of any useful act on the part of this House, or of this Government, and the conclusion of my mind is that it would not; I am therefore resolved to oppose them. I take the object of the mover to have been either to procure the information to serve as the basis of some act of this House in relation to some of our functionaries, the Government or Emperor of France, or the present war with England. Let us then examine them in reference to the first of these objects: if it is intended merely to afford the ground of censure and invective against some one or more of our functionaries, it can produce no good effect, no public benefit could be expected to result; besides, there would be a species of unfairness in the course, as the facts and arguments in defence, on the part of the accused, could not be fully developed. If any misconduct sufficient to ground an impeachment has been transacted, let gentlemen make the charge and proceed by way of impeachment, the subject will then be fully investigated, the accused can be heard.

Let us examine the subject with reference to the Government of France, and I believe it will be seen that no probable good can result. If it is merely to afford the foundation of philippics against the Emperor of France, I object to it, because I would view it as a waste of time, without so much as the consolation of believing that anything we could say would produce a single instant of disagreeable feeling; and certainly it cannot be intended to pave the way for a declaration of war against that nation, when we have a negotiation pending, to finish which we have but recently sent a Minister.

Let us next examine the information sought for with a view to see whether the justice of the present war is dependent upon it: I hold that it is in no point of view dependent upon the withholding of timely information of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees. This will lead me to take a short retrospect of the conduct of Great Britain and France about the time of the date of the Orders in Council, and the Berlin and Milan decrees, for the purpose of showing the true character of the difference between those nations and this; in doing which, it will not be necessary to ascertain which first aggressed upon our rights, or from which we received the greatest quantum of injury; it will be enough that each has given us just cause of war. It will be recollected that France and Great Britain, after having carried on the present war several years previous to the year 1806-7, with all the rancor which the human mind is susceptible of—each struggling for the destruction of the other—found their efforts unavailing by the ordinary course of warfare. France, inflated with and wielding a power on the Continent rarely witnessed, had been unable to conquer Great Britain by the direct operations of war: Great Britain, powerful on the ocean beyond all example, had been unable to bring France to terms by the ordinary course of war upon her ships, colonies, and commerce. In this state of things, they seem to have determined respectively that everything should yield to their views of mutual destruction and self-aggrandizement; that those principles of natural reason, which ought to govern all nations, and which, under the name of national law, had been acknowledged by all civilized nations, should be no longer regarded: they commenced a system of depredation, of plundering of the commerce of all peaceful nations, each alleging that the course taken was founded in just retaliation. Under this state of things, what was the American Government bound to do? I answer, that at most, barely to demand reparation from both; and upon refusal, she might rightfully declare war against one or both, according to our view of political expediency: We were under no moral obligation to procure a repeal of the Berlin or Milan decrees, as a condition precedent to our having a just cause of war against Great Britain for captures under her Orders in Council; neither were we bound to procure a repeal of the Orders in Council as a condition precedent to a just war against France for captures under the Berlin and Milan decrees. Each had violated our perfect rights, and we had a right to select our enemy. As well might it be contended, that a man is bound to adjust the priority of injury between two highwaymen who have at distinct times robbed him, before he shall proceed to enforce the law and recover his property, as to insist that we could have no just cause of war against France or Great Britain, without procuring a repeal of the Orders in Council, or Berlin and Milan decrees.

The American Government it will be recollected endeavored to procure justice, to procure the repeal of these lawless interdictions of neutral commerce by negotiation, and failed. It was then deemed expedient to adopt some counter restriction, with the view and with the hope that it would dispose one or both of the belligerents to act justly. It was highly important to succeed in obtaining justice from even one, as that would have left us to contend single-handed against the other. With this view we resorted to embargo, non-intercourse, and non-importation laws, connected with negotiation. We were bandied about from Paris to Washington, and from Washington to London, to no purpose but to prove the perfidy of the belligerents, for several years. Here, let me ask, whether we are bound perpetually to pursue this course? I think most certainly not. We had a perfect right to cease to endeavor to procure the repeal of either of the belligerent restrictions, and assert our right to the peaceful navigation of the ocean: We did so, and war was declared against Great Britain. I think it but a fair conclusion, from what I have advanced, that the war was just at the time of declaring it, as it stood connected with the Orders in Council. But a view of the war as connected with other causes will go to establish still more firmly the conclusion, and strengthen the arguments before advanced.

We were entitled to compensation for spoliations upon our commerce; and a renunciation on the part of Great Britain of the doctrine of her right to impress seamen from on board American ships; and an abandonment of the practice. As I have heard no person contend that there were not causes for war, according to the principles of national law, it will be unnecessary to stop to prove them so; it will only be proper to remark somewhat on their nature. With respect to the first, I will barely remark, that one of the strongest possible guarantees against the repetition of national injuries, is the exacting complete reparation for past wrongs. With respect to the second, it is in every point of view important: the very end of the institution of Government is violated in respect to our seafaring men, if we neglect or refuse to protect them to the utmost of our power. A second argument is drawn from the very injurious effect the practice would have upon our commerce; it would be in the power of the British Government in this way to supplant us in every market. A third argument to show its importance, is drawn from the inestimable value of personal liberty. A fourth reason for making a firm stand in opposition to it, is, that it is of a permanent nature; it is not one of those rights which

Great Britain sets up as a belligerent right, depending upon the present war; but one which she claims to exercise through all time.

From the foregoing view, the conclusion is much strengthened, that we had good cause of war; and that political expediency required it should be declared is, to my mind, also strongly evinced.

Further, sir, I am opposed to these resolutions, because they seem to imply that we had no cause of war except for spoliations under the Orders in Council, or, that we were willing to abandon the other causes. If these resolutions pass, it might be inferred, and would, I have no doubt, by our enemy, that we now thought we had not sufficient cause of war, without resorting to injuries under the Orders in Council; that we now repented the course we have taken. I am opposed to such policy; nothing can be gained by it, and much may be lost. We have taken a course, it is not unjust, and interest and honor requires we should pursue it firmly, and if possible bring it to a successful end.

Again, sir, I am opposed to these resolutions, because I believe they are ill-timed, and may have an unhappy effect on our negotiations now pending with Great Britain. It appears to me entirely probable, that if the British Ministry are informed of our being about to review the causes which have been alleged for the war, that she will be indisposed to concede anything until she knows the result; this may produce delay, and defeat the negotiation entirely. We ought not to expect reparation, if we but seem to doubt our claim.

It is contended on the part of those that support the resolutions, that the British Government were not notified of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees in proper time; and that the war would have been prevented by a timely notice of the repeal, by producing the repeal of the Orders in Council. It is impossible to know certainly that a repeal of the Orders in Council would not have preceded our declaration of war, if the repeal had been promptly communicated; but, to my mind, there seems to be little ground for the inference, that they certainly would have been repealed, taking into view the terms of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, or rather the modification, and the kind of repeal which was required by the British Government. Mr. Foster, the British Minister, in his letter to Mr. Monroe, our Secretary of State, dated July 3d, 1811, says "That, whenever France should have effectually repealed her Berlin and Milan decrees, and should have restored neutral commerce to the condition in which it stood previously to the promulgation of those decrees, we should immediately repeal our Orders in Council." This is the language of the authorized agent of the British Government; and, from this declaration, we were required not only to procure from France such a modification as would restore our own commerce as a neutral to its wonted footing, but a complete repeal, restoring the commerce of all neutral nations to the footing upon which it rested before the issuing of the Berlin and Milan decrees. The repeal or rather modification of the Berlin and Milan decrees of the 28th of April, 1811, only respected American commerce, leaving the commerce of all other neutrals to their operation. Hence it is evident, that the Orders in Council could not be expected to be repealed upon the production of an instrument merely modifying those decrees to favor the Americans: and this would seem at least a tolerable apology for not giving the British Government early information of the existence of such instrument. It was not such a writing as they required. And, by the way, I think their requisition so insulting and so unreasonable, that no further attempt ought to have been made; it was not enough that we would obtain from France a partial repeal or modification so as to secure our rights, but we were required to engage in the very chivalrous business of being the advocate and champion of all neutral nations, in order to procure the exercise of our rights.

But, sir, I do not believe the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees was the true cause of the rescinding the Orders in Council. The Prince Regent, in the instrument repealing the Orders in Council, expresses his opinion that the French repealing decree was not such as had been required; from which, believing as I do, that he was not disposed to yield to the United States or any other nation anything through mere courtesy, I infer that some other reason or cause induced the repeal. More than a month elapsed between the notification of the repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, before the Orders in Council were repealed. Another reason to show it improbable that the one was really the cause of the other: It will be recollected, that great complaints existed in the great manufacturing towns of Great Britain on account of the operation of the Orders in Council; that a lengthy investigation was had in the House of Commons to ascertain their effects upon their own commerce and manufactures. Now, sir, I believe that the result of this inquiry was, that their own restrictions were recoiling upon themselves; that their own manufactures, one of the main pillars of their opulence and power, was about to be sapped, and the nation vitally injured; and this I believe was the real cause of the repeal of the Orders in Council. The modification of the Berlin and Milan decrees happily presented an apology, and rescued them from the open shame of being obliged to abandon their own measures without a plausible reason.

It has been contended by some of those who support these resolutions, that if the Orders in Council had been repealed, we would not have gone to war on account of the doctrine and practice of impressment; and they infer this from our Government failing to press the subject of impressment for some time in the course of the last attempts at adjustment by negotiation. To this I answer, that it is impossible to know what course our Government would have taken; but it is very clear to me, that this nation would have shown an astonishing indifference to its honor and interest to have abandoned the ground which it had taken, and ably maintained by argument, in relation to this point. But I conceive there is a very satisfactory reason, why the American Government did not continually press this point: this was a matter in which Britain stood alone; it did not depend upon the war; it was important to adjust with one of the warring Powers the differences connected with the war, with a view to placing one of them more directly and exclusively in the wrong. This I take to be the true reason why the point of impressment was not so constantly pressed, and not that our Government viewed it as inconsiderable in its nature.

If my view of the effects of these resolutions be correct, they ought not to pass, because the information sought for, be it what it may, cannot form the basis of any useful public act; and because the passage would seem to imply that we have no cause of war against Great Britain but what was connected with the Orders in Council; and because their passage would be ill-timed, and may injuriously affect our present attempt to negotiate with Britain.

Mr. TELFAIR expressed his regret at the range that this question had taken, though an apprehension of the reality had been excited by the introduction of the resolutions before the House. He arose not to follow the example of gentlemen, but to exhibit it in a point of view in which, to his surprise, it had not yet been presented. Sir, the question of the policy, the justice, or necessity of a declaration of war is not the one now before the nation—it is idle to spend time in debating it—the special and important objects of this session will not sanction the discussion of it. It has not only been discussed in its proper place, but was renewed at the last session, and the causes most ably developed. May I be excused, sir, in expressing an apprehension that the consciousness of defeat at that time has induced the opposition to renew their charge at this session, goaded on as they are by recent mortification, and cheered by the enchantments of existing hope. But, sir, is there no termination to a question of this sort? Is every effort of the Government in prosecuting the war to be clogged by details of the causes which produced it? What, Mr. Speaker, is the acknowledged definition of war? It is the combined energies of one nation brought forcibly into action against the united exertions of another, legitimately authorized by either. Who, sir, under our Constitution, is authorized to declare war? Not, as in England, a capricious or ambitious monarch; but the Congress of the United States—a body taken from the people, and liable again to return among them—emphatically, sir, the people themselves. Surely, then, when the nation is legitimately declared to be in a state of war, when, in the language of the definition, the people are called upon to unite in resisting foreign dominion—when the enemy is knocking at your very doors, it is the duty not only of the minor officers of this country to stand forth in its cause, but it is more imperiously the duty of every branch of that power which had declared it to prosecute it with vigor, to the intent that an honorable and permanent peace may be secured. The declaration of war, when legitimately made, is like every other truth demonstrated to the human mind, which is ever after received as an undeniable proposition, whence to deduce other consequences, until refuted by additional developments of the same faculty which established it. But the same authority under our Constitution which declared the war is not adequate to a restoration of peace. Hence, the want of complete analogy; hence, when the Congress have declared the nation in a state of war, its judgment is final as to itself—to prosecute it is within its competency; but legislation for a peace is by this act transferred to the treaty-making power. But, sir, further, this is defensive war; for that nation which has committed the first aggression upon some primary or essential right of another, has commenced the act of war, and that other which reacts under a declaration, whether by retaliation or otherwise, is on the defensive. Yes, sir, such a nation is on the defensive, even though an attack upon the enemy in his own quarters be made, in order to secure you from future harm. And will gentlemen pretend to say that Great Britain has not committed glaring outrages upon the primary and essential rights of this nation; that she has not levelled a deadly blow at its very independence? That she has not essayed to bring us back to a state of colonization? Was not the requisition to pass all of our vessels through her ports, there to pay a tax or duty, in the form of license, such an outrage? Was not the extensive blockade of the ports of Europe, without an adequate force, under which our vessels were rifled, such a violation of the fundamental principles of national law as to justify this nation in resistance? Was not, I ask, sir, the horrid usurpation of impressing American seamen, of consigning them to the most cruel of bondage, that under which they might be compelled to serve as instruments in heaping insult and injury upon their own nation, upon their countrymen, their brethren, an encroachment of the most daring kind—a violation of a primary and essential right of this nation, such as called for manly reaction on our part?

Gentlemen, in the course of debate, have revived the insulting, and I had hoped obsolete charge of French influence. It is not, sir, in my nature to enter a defence, which would be as degrading to me, as derogatory to the Chief Magistrate of this nation, whose enlightened and liberalized mind early rose superior to that unhallowed selfishness of soul which grasps at the trappings of aristocracy, and with conscious littleness shrinks from the sacred principles of Republicanism, because it affords no artificial props to ephemeral greatness. The private as well as public virtues of this man so effectually shield him from the shafts of unjust insinuations as to need no vindication. I speak, sir, with freedom, because I am conscious that those who know me will not believe me capable of flattery. As I should despise more than I can express the Administration susceptible of such an influence, in like manner is my abhorrence of such a charge made upon any other than the most irresistible evidence.

Sir, the gentlemen who repeat this charge should recur to the source whence so degrading an imputation first emanated. He who first proclaimed the existence of French influence in this country was proven an abhorred and cruel traitor. Yes, sir, the first tongue which dared to utter such an insinuation was that of the ever accursed Arnold—let gentlemen then pause, and weigh well the motive of such a charge. But let me not, hence, be supposed to accuse every one who repeats it of nurturing the same execrable spirit—no, sir, I dare not wrong myself by uttering so unwarranted an accusation against honorable members; yet I would expect of gentlemen to refer to those sentiments of honor which are their boast before they repeat so foul a charge derived from so infamous a source.

Mr. Speaker, much time has been wasted in reviewing the insults and injuries inflicted upon this nation by the Government of France—wasted, I say, because it is not accompanied by any proposition, on the part of those who have done so, to resist them by a declaration of war—wasted, sir, because they aim at no practical result. All that I have to answer is simply this: both Great Britain and France have committed outrages upon this nation sufficient to justify on our part the most determined war, and consequently whichever of them had been selected would have presented to my mind ample and sufficient causes for its vigorous prosecution. Upon my entrance into this body, I find the nation involved in a war forced upon it by the injustice of the enemy; and because another Government has been hardly less iniquitous, I see no reason for abandoning the attitude which a prior Congress had assumed, even though it were admitted that this body as such had a right to do so, the contrary of which I have endeavored to prove. As a general principle, it is certainly true, that where the genuine interest of the country has been compromised by its Administration, it becomes the duty of every good citizen to hold it up to the view of the people in its real character, that no future confidence may be reposed in it. But it is equally true, that where the Government has been driven to its final resort by the aggressions of a powerful enemy, it then becomes the duty of every good citizen to hesitate before he attempts to expose those matters to the world, properly within the Executive discretion; for the same medium which would convey to the people the errors of its agents at this time, would also expose to the enemy the weakness of the Government, and its inadequacy to support the cause in which it is engaged. And, sir, I am emboldened to say, that in relation to the question before us, there can be no discrimination between the Administration and the country; on the contrary, there is a complete identity. great belligerents of Europe, before our declaration of war, should recollect he is doing more than exposing the weakness of their agents to the people, the rightful sovereigns of the nation; he is exposing the defects of his own Government to the enemy; instead of closing, he is widening the breach; instead of strengthening the arm of his country, he is weakening its energies. But these gentlemen profess to be the friends of peace. If sowing seeds from which inevitably spring dissensions, evinces a love of peace; if debilitating their own Government, and thereby encouraging the enemy, mark the character of a pacific disposition; finally, if local predilections countenancing sentiments tending to disunion, are peculiar to the man of peace, I shall not envy the title. But, sir, from the generality of my positions, two presumptions might possibly be assumed by some as necessary consequences: either that I would limit the freedom of the press in seasons of danger; or that a consciousness of something wrong in the Cabinet, as it is called, would induce me to screen it from investigation. Let me be understood to have advanced a principle intended to have a moral, not a coercive operation. No member of this House would be found more unwilling to restrain the freedom of the press; I would permit its widest latitude, except where its object was undeniably to aid the enemy; I would not forcibly restrain its most unrestrained licentiousness when applying its scourges to public agents; after travelling through the whole circle of licentiousness, I would let it stand self-convicted and self-converted. Further, I fear not the test of these resolutions; I feel perfectly assured that the answer of the Executive will be such as to enhance its character; and if the resolutions were in themselves proper, and the answer could be confined to the people of this country, I should be found among their warmest advocates.

I am now, Mr. Speaker, brought to the special reasons which will induce my negative to these resolutions. It has been admitted by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHEFFEY,) or the mover of these resolutions, (Mr. WEBSTER,) I cannot distinctly recollect which, and if I err in the reference, I assert the fact myself, that the resolution introduced at the close of the last session, and answered by the President, embraced all the matter in general terms, contained in those now before the House, so far as is consistent with the relative characters of the Executive and Legislative branches. It was in these words:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to be caused to be laid before this House the French decree purporting to be a repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, referred to in his Message of the 4th of November last, together with such information as he may possess concerning the time and manner of promulgating the same; and also any correspondence or information touching the relations of the United States with France, in the office of the Department of State, not heretofore communicated, which, in the opinion of the President, it is not incompatible with the public interest to communicate.”

This House, then, sir, had made a special call upon the Executive as to the time and manner of the promulgation of this decree; they made a general call as to all correspondences and other information touching the relations between this Government and that of France, with the usual exception of such matters as the public interest forbade him to communicate. This resolution having been answered by the President, enclosing the documents desired, what, I ask, sir, was the fair and reasonable presumption? Certainly that the President had done his duty; that he had communicated all the information in the Department of State not within the express reservation or exception contained in the resolution itself; and this belief, no doubt, upon the receipt of the President's answer, existed in every mind, until the assertion of the Duke of Bassano, not repeated in his note to Mr. Barlow, destroyed in some minds this fair presumption. This presumption, which in the discussion of a contested election the day before yesterday, was urged with so much pertinacity and success by the gentlemen on the other side of the House, the advocates of these resolutions seem now to have abandoned or forgotten. A sheriff in that instance had been required by the law to administer an oath to the clerks of election, but no certificate of such oath appearing on the returns, the petitioning member avers that it was not administered; but, sir, such regard had the gentleman for the reputation of this officer, that this presumption was sufficient to repel the assertion of a respectable individual, formerly a member of this House, and at that time petitioning to be admitted in lieu of the sitting member. This presumption in favor of the officer, I believed with them to be founded in sound principle, and its influence was visible on the vote of this House—a principle whose influence cherishes, not only the character of the honest officer of the Government, but pervades every class of the community—for every man is presumed innocent until proven to be guilty. But, forsooth, this principle in every other situation so sacred, when applied to the Chief Magistrate of the United States, is rejected—to him it furnishes no protection. A being whose character has been portrayed with a pencil dipped in acrimony; a being whom the opposition have described as the mere creature of Bonaparte, the prime agent of the destroyer of Europe, is to absolve, by a mere ipse dixit, this fair and most reasonable presumption. Upon the declaration of such an individual in the conversation with our Minister, that the decree had been communicated to the predecessor of Mr. Barlow, the presumption that the President had done his duty, had communicated everything relative to its promulgation which the interest of the country did not forbid, suddenly vanishes—an effect which the assertion of the most respectable freeman of his country would not produce under like circumstances, if uttered against the most insignificant officer of the Government. This enchantment, indeed, looks like French influence; and, sir, we have strong reason to apprehend that the morality of this new standard of veracity—this same Duke of Bassano—will supersede the doctrines of that good pious soul the Prince Regent, the bulwark of our religion.

But to be serious, sir, I am one prepared to give the preference to the implied assertion of the President, that other information was not in the Department of State, or if there, the public interest, in his estimation, forbade its communication. Sir, though I have no apprehension but that the President will be able to return an answer to these resolutions, honorable to the Government, permit me to close with a single illustration of the principle with which I commenced. When the great navigator Columbus conceived the existence of a new world, much opposition naturally arose to the enterprise—it appearing to many too visionary and replete with difficulties. Such opposition, under such impressions, was certainly justifiable. The mariners who afterwards associated themselves with him would indubitably have been justified in refusing to embark; but after the voyage was commenced, when within a few day's sail of land, who is not filled with emotion upon recurring to the murmurs and violence threatened? Who does not rejoice in the compromise which was rewarded by a new world; else what had been the unborn greatness of this Congress itself? Sir, I instance this merely to show that an opposition may at one period be justifiable and not at another—prior to its declaration was the time to have opposed the war.

Mr. PEARSON addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. Speaker: I rise to address you under circumstances not the most favorable to myself; nor can I indulge the expectation of obtaining the patient attention of the House at this late hour of the day, and after a discussion, on the part of some gentlemen at least, so able and so interesting. But, sir, impelled by a sense of positive duty to myself, and to those good men who have placed me here as their representative, I cannot for a moment hesitate to forego all considerations of personal convenience, to do that which every gentleman of the minority, in the habit of speaking, ought to do, protest against the abominable, the slavish doctrine advanced, and repel the charges and insinuations made by the member from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY.) It is not, however, my purpose solely to notice the remarks of the member from Tennessee; nor shall I pursue other gentlemen through all their windings and turnings, in the wild, wide range they have taken in this debate. The proposition before us, demands some attention. It is plain, simple, and distinct; it is an inquiry for "the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth," in relation to a subject deemed vitally interesting to us as a people—involving the reputation of our Administration and its agents, or that being and his agents, who tells us he loves us, and we are doomed to call our ally. To gentlemen situated as the honorable member from Kentucky, (Mr. McKEE,) who was ignorant of the call made on the Executive last session on this subject, and the result of that call—to some gentlemen who have just taken their seats in the House for the first time, the resolutions under consideration may appear unnecessarily definite and inquisitorial. They might well imagine, that a general resolution, in ordinary form, would bring forth all the information now desired. The reasonableness of this opinion proves, incontestably, the propriety and necessity of the course now proposed. A general call, such as that proposed by the gentleman from Kentucky, was made near the close of the last session of Congress. The terms of that resolution were sufficiently broad and comprehensive to authorize the expectation, that the information sought for would be obtained. What was the fact? In the night, and at the last hour of the session, a confidential Message was received from the President containing those garbled extracts which have excited so much suspicion and indignation, which evidently left a tale behind, which it is our purpose and our duty to unfold. It is a fact also, not unworthy of remembrance, that in reply to a call of the Senate on this same subject, the like extracts were given under the injunction of secrecy. Is it not a theme for curious speculation, to know what high and weighty considerations of State rendered necessary a pledge of secrecy on the part of both branches of the Legislature, as the condition on which those precious extracts should be made known to them; and what sudden change of policy should have absolved the members of this House from the pledge of secrecy, which for several weeks had been imposed on the Senate? What was the real motive for keeping those papers from the public eye is to me unknown; and I trust, other considerations, than the mere convenience of the galleries, authorized their public disclosure.

Mr. Speaker: In a Government like this, where not only freedom, but publicity of debate is guarantied by the charter of our rights; where the people have the right to know, not only what is done, but how and by whom, all transactions enveloped in mystery, or clothed with secrecy, naturally excite suspicion, and not unfrequently alarm. This will continue inseparable from our nature, whilst a vestige of liberty remains. It is that characteristic of freemen which distinguishes them from the slaves and sycophants of power. Here let me tell gentlemen, whatever may be their opinions, however honest and unbounded may be their confidence, there does exist no slight impression among many of our best and wisest men, that all is not right in the relations of this country with the Government of France—that "something is rotten in the state of Denmark." Whether this impression be well or illy founded, is not for me to say; but when we reflect, that amid this massy pile of documents, with which your tables are breaking and your shelves are groaning, so few pages are to be found in relation to our complicated concerns with France, scarcely one entire letter to be seen, and no where to be heard a bold, dignified and spirited tone of remonstrance against the monstrous wrongs and galling insults of the tyrant who rules that devoted nation: When it is recollected, also, that there is a private chest, a box of arcana in the vaults of this House, whose contents, though almost moulding with age, have not yet seen the light; and of whose importance many gentlemen of this House can bear testimony, particularly the honorable gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. PICKERING,) who but lately, whilst a member of the Senate, underwent a sort of ordeal for having impudently, or inadvertently, brought to the light one of those hidden offsprings of French intrigue, still too tender for exposure. When all these things crowd upon our recollection, and when it is evident, as has been shown by my honorable friend from Maryland, (Mr. HANSON,) from the written testimony of your late Secretary of State, (a man then high in your confidence,) and for a supposed insinuation against his veracity, the nation was nearly set into a flame, and the offender, a man in the character of a messenger of peace, banished like a culprit from our land; that the Executive of these United States did, after the arrival of the French Minister Serrurier, in the month of February, 1811, refuse to permit necessary and proper inquiries to be made of him, in relation to the pretended repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, and did permit the unfortunate law of 2d March, 1811, to be passed, (confirming the erroneous and fatal proclamation, of the 2d November, 1810,) under the false supposition that the French decrees had been repealed, when almost every man doubted, and many of the most intelligent denied the fact, without allowing those inquiries to be made, which would have elicited the truth, dispelled our doubts, and saved the nation from the gulf into which it has fallen. With these and many other facts and circumstances (some of which perhaps I may have occasion to notice in the course of my remarks) fresh in the recollection of a free, a jealous, and enlightened people, is it, ought it to be a matter of surprise even with the most confident believers in Executive purity and infallibility, that such suspicions, such impressions as I have stated, do exist? No, sir, the wonder is, they are not universal. I hesitate not to say, I never have considered the communications from the present and late Executive, on the subject of French affairs, sufficiently full, free, and entire—they have in general been characterized by a tameness of expression, easily mistaken for the language of apology. Indeed, our late Minister in France, (Barlow,) from his own showing, disdained not to become the apologist of France for acts of the most flagrant and wanton injustice, which the agents of that nation did not deign to palliate or excuse. Witness what he said in justification of our trading under French license. Witness his excuse for the seizure and judgment of confiscation of the brig Belisarius and cargo, by the Council of Prizes, in January or February, 1812, because this vessel and cargo were liable to the decree of Milan, of the 17th December, 1807. Witness the reasons he urges for the promulgation of the paper in question, purporting to be a repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, bearing date 28th April, 1811. He shrewdly conceived, after the appearance of the declaration of the Prince Regent of the 21st April, 1812, that a document might be exhibited, so carved and cut and antedated, as to satisfy the incredulous of his country, and still steer clear of producing a repeal of the Orders in Council. He did not ask it for his own satisfaction, or that of his Government. No, he was perfectly satisfied that the Berlin and Milan decrees had ceased to be applied to American vessels. And why?—because America did not permit her flag to be denationalized. In other words, because America had conformed to the principles of those decrees—she submitted to them, and claimed the benefit of exception, expressed in the decrees themselves. Yes, sir, here is the only true reason why our vessels are or have at any time been exempted from the full effect and operation of those decrees. It is an admission supported, to my understanding by the most incontestable facts, that those decrees are not, and never have for a moment been repealed; that no exemption from their rigid operation, in our favor, was ever admitted till after the proclamation of the President was received in France. Even that proclamation did not arrest the progress of seizures and captures; it had the effect only of continuing our property in a state of sequestration, mortgaged as security for further resistance to Great Britain, which was accomplished by the law of March, 1811; and not until the knowledge of that law in France, was there a single case of an American vessel captured since the 1st of November, 1810, that had been released, or even had a trial. Strange, then, that gentlemen will still contend, as some have this day, that those decrees ceased to violate our neutral commerce on the 1st of November, 1810, and that there have been no cases of seizure, capture, and condemnation, under them, from that time to this. They might as well have said, there had been no burnings either. The truth is, there have been seizures, captures, and condemnations, almost uniformly during the whole period. I defy any gentleman to produce a single case where a decision has been made by the Council of Prizes, the regular tribunal for pronouncing the law, exempting American vessels from the operation of those decrees. On the contrary, there are cases of their express application—condemnations have been made of American vessels within the period alluded to, by the Council of Prizes—among other reasons for having violated those very decrees. I can here instance the ship Julian, and Hercules, and others, which have been furnished from the Department of State. The fact is this, sir: since we have taken up the business of resistance in conformity to the dictates of the Berlin and Milan decrees, the Emperor in his good pleasure, has, by his own special interposition, released many of our vessels which would have otherwise been condemned, and thus our submission to, has been transformed into a repeal of his decrees. But, sir, why labor this subject, already worn threadbare. The Emperor himself has proven that the famous letter of 5th August, 1810, did not warrant the assertion that his decrees were repealed, and thus does he give the lie to the proclamation of your President. Mr. Speaker, in addition to the important disclosure already stated on the authority of your late Secretary of State, permit me to refer to the same authority, for evidence of a most important fact of concealment, or withholding information, in relation to the views and intentions of the French Government; which, had it been disclosed, would or ought to have been all essential to the deliberations of this House, and ought of itself to have prevented the enactment of that unwarrantable and fatal law of March 2, 1811. The fact is this: That on the 22d of February, 1811, previous to the passage of the law of March, and whilst it was under consideration in the House of Representatives, the French Government did, formally and officially, through their Minister, Mr. Serurier, make known their determination not to restore the property which had been seized and condemned in the ports of France.

It will be recollected, by the construction which the President himself gave to his own powers under the law of May, 1810, as expressed by the letters from the Department of State to the American Minister in France, of 5th June and July, 1810, that the restoration, or satisfactory assurances of indemnity for the immense amount of American property unjustly seized and condemned in France, was made an indispensable pre-requisite—the sine qua non, to the enforcement of the non-importation against England, and the contrary as to France. With this declaration before us, and before the world, was it just, was it fair, was it consistent, to withhold from the Legislature of this nation, the knowledge of the fact that the property of our citizens would not be restored—that this indispensable pre-requisite would not be complied with? Could we with a knowledge of this fact have passed the law of March, 1811? Would we have done a deed so pregnant with mischief, and which has brought forth the calamities we now endure?

Mr. Speaker, will it be said that the evidence of your late Secretary of State, has lost its conclusive authority with many of his former admirers? be it so; the facts, however, here stated, never have been denied, they are susceptible of proof, and you are pointed to the witness.

The statement receives additional confirmation to my mind, from having been told by a gentleman of unquestionable veracity, about the time of the present French Minister's arrival in this city, that the late Secretary of State informed him, that he intended to relieve Congress and the nation from the suspense and doubt which existed in relation to the repeal of the French decrees, by being very explicit and decisive with the new French Minister, on the subject—or words to this effect. Sir, the note he prepared was explicit and decisive; but it was explicitly and decisively refused to be sent by the higher authority. Well do I remember the history of those times, and although I never for a moment believed in the fair and bona fide repeal of the French decrees, I participated in the general satisfaction expressed on hearing of the arrival of the French Minister at Norfolk—believing the period was then at hand, when all doubt, all embarrassment on the question of the pretended repeal would be removed, and the real state of our relations with France made bare to the nation. The dubious, unfixed, and tardy course of the Committee of Foreign Relations at that period cannot be forgotten—even their labors were suspended for the event. Sir, the Minister arrived, but our fond expectations were blasted, not a word, not a whisper of intelligence reached this House; we were left still to grapple in the dark; the Committee of Foreign Relations hurried through the law of March, 1811, the effects of which are now scourging this land. What our disappointment was on this occasion, can well be imagined; but what our indignation ought to have been, when made acquainted with the cause of this disappointment, cannot be expressed.

One word more, sir, on this hated subject of French decrees. I have stated, at the time of issuing the President's proclamation, and passing the law of March, 1811, I did not believe in their repeal; and here I will take occasion to remark, that, independent of other evidence, the testimony of Mr. Jonathan Russell, then our agent in France, in his letters to the Department of State, during the winter of 1810-'11, tended strongly to confirm this opinion; the facts he relates in relation to the seizure of the New Orleans Packet, the schooner Friendship, and, others, and his reasoning on those facts, are not only conclusive as to the continued operation of those decrees, but that he knew they were not repealed. This gentleman, however, seems subsequently to have changed his opinions, and yielding perhaps to an impetus not to be resisted, labors to prove that we were not shuffled into the lead, where national honor and the law required us to follow. As this gentleman is one of the persons implicated in the subject of the present inquiry, let me say, whilst I remember it, that so far from having the terms of those resolutions narrowed, or the inquiry more limited, I would suggest to the honorable mover the propriety of adding an interrogatory to this effect—whether Mr. Russell has, by any public official communication, denied or admitted the charge made by the Duke of Bassano, that the decree of the 28th April, 1811, was communicated to him at or about the time of its date. No private or verbal declarations on the subject ought to satisfy us.

Mr. Speaker, I profess no peculiar solicitude for the personal honor of the Executive, or any of his agents who have been figuring at foreign Courts; much less do I profess or feel for the tyrant of France, or his minions who have shared in the disgraceful transaction which forms the subject of this inquiry. Nor, sir, do I assert any peculiar claims to those stern virtues which distinguish the enlightened statesman and devoted patriot—all I profess is a just respect for the constituted authorities, obedience to Constitutional laws, love for my native country, and the character of an honest man. It is perfectly immaterial to me what is the object of those resolutions, or what use may be made of the information when obtained; for me it is enough to know, that guilt of the most damning hue does exist, whether at the Palace, the Tuilleries, or among the sub-agents, ought to be known, and the just vengeance of an injured, indignant people, light on the guilty head. As one of the people, and as the representative of thousands, I demand this information as a right, as an act of justice.

The member from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) has, I presume, for the purpose of justifying the declaration of war against Great Britain, and lessening the effect of our representations of French enormities, reminded us of the result of a motion made by a gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. McKEE,) to include France in the declaration of war. This is not the first time that circumstance has been alluded to, with an emphasis and an air of triumph ill-becoming so poor a victory, and had indeed must be that cause which boasts of such success. Had I not been a member of this House long enough to have learned not to be surprised at anything done or said here, my astonishment would have been excited at the bare mention of the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky, by any member of the majority acquainted with the result and the circumstances under which it was made. Had not every measure of that session, every syllable which fell from the lips of the majority, and every act of the Executive, pointed to Great Britain alone as the object of the war? Had we not been told, that the return of France to a sense of justice demanded our resistance to Great Britain? Nay, were we not amused with the prospect of early negotiation, and strict amity with that nation, down to the moment of plunging into this war, and indeed ever since, as far as amusement was to be found in such prospects and such representations? Had not the Message of the President, recommending an immediate declaration of war, been received, and were we not in Committee of the Whole, with closed doors, on the declaration of war itself, when the motion of the gentleman from Kentucky was made? Who supposed that motion bore a serious aspect, or had been made the subject of previous deliberation? Who voted for it? Substantially nobody. Some eight or ten members on both sides of the House rose on the question; no discussion took place, except a few remarks from the mover, and no decision was even asked for by the House. If this motion ought to have been adopted, whose fault was it that it was not? The majority; they alone had the power. If it was properly rejected, why exhibit it now as a charge against the minority? The truth is, the motion was considered as calculated, if not intended, to commit the minority. It was known they professed themselves the friends of peace, they would not vote for the declaration of war. Suppose, then, they had voted to include France, and ultimately, as they did do, voted against the war, what would have been your language—how much more splendid your triumph? Then would you have chanted with more melody, "Moral traitors! Friends to the fast-anchored isle!"

Such was the nakedness of your preparations, and the poverty of your finances, that I deemed any war, except a defensive one against the encroachments of the savages on your frontier, as little short of infatuation, of perfect madness.

Under such auspices and such commanders I shrunk from involving my country in the horrors of such a contest. The issue, thus far, has but too fatally realized my fears.

Mr. Speaker, the member from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY,) in reply to opinions advanced by gentlemen on this side of the House, that the Orders in Council were the great leading cause of the war, and a knowledge of their repeal would have prevented the declaration, has asked for the evidence on which those opinions are founded. Sir, in the absence of those volumes of testimony, which do exist, and are to be found in almost every page of the correspondence between the two Governments, down to the very moment of declaring the war, and without recurring to the speeches of that gentleman and his friends during the war session, sufficient evidence is furnished by the gentleman himself to his own question. He says it is uncertain, no man can tell whether war would have been declared if the Orders in Council had been repealed. What does this prove? That neither the gentleman himself, or any other member of the Committee of Foreign Relations, deemed it of sufficient importance, or took the trouble to ascertain their own, or the sentiments of others on the question of impressment, the sole alleged object for now continuing the war. Can it be that the gentleman, in his zeal to ascertain who would vote for the war, did not stop to inquire why and wherefore they would thus involve their country? I cannot suppose the Committee of Foreign Relations thus negligent, or the other members who voted for the war so fatally bent on mischief. In addition to this, declarations of gentlemen on this floor, and in private conversation on this subject, render the conclusion irresistible, that the war would not have been declared had the Orders in Council been repealed; unless, indeed, we had become so furious as not to be appeased but by this feast of blood.

Mr. Speaker, whether the promulgation of the French repealing decree, of April, 1811, at the time it bears date, would have produced a repeal of the Orders in Council, is perhaps, at this time, a question not very essential to decide. It has, however, received much importance from this discussion. In reply to a remark from the honorable mover of the resolutions under consideration, and an opinion advanced by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. SHEFFEY,) the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN,) not content to permit the effect of the promulgation of the French repealing decree, at the time it bears date, to remain a matter of opinion and speculation, not content with merely controverting, by argument, the opinions which had been advanced, he, in a tempest of zeal, and in language peculiar, undertakes to prove, beyond the possibility of a doubt, to put the question forever at rest, and fix falsehood on him who "dares hereafter to say, if 'the French decree of repeal had been known, 'the British Orders would have been repealed, 'and the war thus prevented." Mr. Speaker, I will not follow the example of the gentleman from South Carolina, by hazarding a positive assertion on a question susceptible of doubt, and depending on motives in other breasts, impossible for us to ascertain; but I dare to say, the gentleman has fallen far short of convincing me of the correctness of his position, or of putting the question at rest. So far, then, as depends on the evidence of opinion, founded on a knowledge of facts before us, I must dissent from the opinion so confidently expressed by the gentleman from South Carolina, (Mr. CALHOUN.)

It is true, the declaration of the Prince Regent of the 21st April, 1812, and some of the letters of Mr. Foster, near the close of his correspondence with the Secretary of State, required the repeal on the part of France to be absolute and unconditional. It is equally true, that the last letter from Mr. Foster on this subject, (and that, too, after he had received the declaration of the Prince Regent) declares the repeal of the French decrees as preliminary to a repeal of the Orders in Council, to be such as we had a right to require in our character of a neutral nation. It will also be recollected, that the question between this Government and Great Britain was, whether the decrees of France had been repealed at all, and not as to the extent of that repeal. The British Government denied the letter of the Duc de Cadore, of August 5th, to amount to a repeal, and required some authentic document of the fact. We contended that the letter of the 5th August, together with the late practices of France, in relation to us, were satisfactory evidence to entitle us to an abrogation of the British orders. Thus, all discussion, as to the partial suspension of the French decrees, or our conditional and partial exemption from them, entitling us to the like exemption from the British orders, was perfectly superfluous—an argument from premises totally denied, and stated by Mr. Foster, in the correspondence relied on by gentlemen on the other side of the House, to be altogether unnecessary and irrelevant. The declaration of the Prince Regent, so far from assuming higher ground than had been before occupied, always appeared to me to have been intended to furnish an opening for the promulgation of any French repealing decree that might exist, and if none did exist, that we might, more consistently with our former admissions, require one to be issued. This is inferred by the declaration, insisting only on the promulgation of a repealing document, regardless of its construction, or the practice under it, as preliminary to the repeal of the Orders in Council. It is fair to argue, from what has, to what would have happened. The Orders in Council were repealed as soon after the appearance of the French repealing decree, as the unsettled state of the British Cabinet would admit; and the reason given for this change of policy was the promulgation of that decree—the difficulty gentlemen find in tracing up any other cause, proves what has been alleged to be the true one.

Some gentlemen have attributed this sudden and important change of system to the clamor of the manufacturing interest. Sir, this clamor was of no recent date. It was as loud on the 21st April, the date of the declaration of the Prince Regent, as it was on the 23d June, the day on which the orders were repealed—the result of the examination in Parliament on the subject, was, I presume, as well known on 21st April as on 23d June. In addition to this, were we not informed by the Executive himself, within a few days of the declaration of war, that no prospect of a change in the British policy existed? Was not this the language of our agent in London, and did he not tell us that war was inevitable? It cannot then, be, that this was the real cause of the repeal of the Orders in Council.

The same, and other gentlemen, have, in their laborious and sagacious search for a cause, ventured to attribute no inconsiderable share in producing the repeal of the Orders in Council, to the armor and attitude assumed by the Message of the President—backed by the Report of the Committee of Foreign Relations, and those expenditures which followed in their train. Unfortunately, this supposition, like the preceding, is opposed by facts which cannot yield to this sort of speculation. The Message, the Report of the Committee, your Army bill, and threatening war speeches, were known in England before the declaration of the Prince Regent, and long before the repeal of the Orders in Council; no effect was produced—your agent in London tells you none would be produced. The British Minister here manifested no alarm, but agreeable to the opinion of those same gentlemen he was instructed by his Government to make a stand in relation to the Orders in Council, which dissipated all hope of obtaining their repeal, but by an appeal to arms. If, indeed, the British Government were frightened at the aspect of war which was here exhibited—pity it is, the scare-crow system had not been longer kept up, and preserved from the vision and the touch the living skeleton of this war.

If, Mr. Speaker, I should happen to be wrong in all I have said, one short view yet remains in which perhaps I may be more fortunate. I ask any honorable fair-minded man in this House or this nation, if we ought, if we could, consistently with the justice and honor of the country, or consistently with those principles professed by the Administration, have declared war against Great Britain at the time we did, and for the causes alleged, with a knowledge of the insidious, insulting and mysterious decree of the 28th April, 1811? Is it possible, that the sensibility of this nation was so far dead to the wrongs and insults of France, as not to have been aroused by this burning sarcasm, this mark of low contempt and pointed scorn? For the honor of the Legislature of my country, I think it would have stayed the arm uplifted for this war. It would have made them pause, before they summoned up all their strength, and poured out the full vial of their wrath, against the nation with whom we are in conflict. Justly, then, may it be said, that no human punishment can reach the complicated guilt, which lies concealed amidst those transactions which we ask to be unfolded by the resolutions on your table.

Mr. Speaker, a member from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY) finding, perhaps, that the fruitful crop of laurels which was to have been gathered in Canada, and with which, it was imagined, long ere this, the warrior's brow would have been entwined, is fast fading on its native rocks—finding, perhaps, the temporary frenzy which this war and its authors had excited, fast subsiding, by the pressure of events and the influence of common reason, seems to have abandoned all hope of glory; and so far from being the laureat of the hero's praise, descends to the invidious task of an accuser—and the manner of his performance is not less extraordinary, than the office is unenviable. He charges the Opposition with this war and all its calamities.*

If every manly, honorable and patriotic exertion in our power to prevent this war and its horrors, constitutes guilt, then indeed are we guilty. If every fair and Constitutional effort made by us to rescue our country from this disastrous, ruinous war, and save our Constitution and form of Government from the wreck which threatens it, is deemed a crime, then we are criminal. But, sir, when the mist which surrounds us shall have passed away, and whilst a single trace of those old lines remain which separate vice from virtue, guilt from innocence, and truth from error, those our crimes, will be our proudest, brightest virtues.

Mr. Speaker, the gentleman (Mr. GRUNDY) has ventured to advance a doctrine on this floor both novel and extraordinary; a doctrine subversive of every principle of civil liberty, and destructive of our first and dearest, not only of chartered, but birth rights. He deems that man guilty of moral treason who does not volunteer his aid in strengthening the arm of Administration in the prosecution of this war; or who, in the free exercise of the right of speech and opinion, may be the means of inducing others to withhold their personal services or pecuniary resources from the disposal of those who conduct the war. Sir, this doctrine is freighted with the most monstrous consequences—it is not for a moment to be tolerated by a people regardful of their rights. Let this doctrine be once established, an ambitious Executive, and a weak, a wicked, or interested majority of Congress have nothing to do but declare war, under any pretence, or for any cause or object, however unimportant, or however destructive of our best interests, we will be bound to strengthen the arm lifted for our destruction—join in acclamations of praise to our destroyers, or sit by, in silent anguish, awaiting the death-blow to our Constitution, and with it our liberties as a people. If the people, who have been taught to believe they are secure in the right, not only of expressing their opinions fully and openly in relation to the conduct of their rulers, their motives and the tendency of their measures, but also, in the right to change those rulers—are now to be told (and they should believe it) that their rights are only to be exercised in a state of peace and on ordinary occasions; but in time of war they are to be suspended or put out of existence—(the time above all others when they ought to be most vigilantly exercised and sacredly guarded;) when these things come to pass—when this doctrine of moral treason becomes the order of the day—then may we say, good-by to the liberties of our country—welcome tyranny, welcome Bonaparte, welcome oppression in any other shape; for when the measure of our sufferings is full, little does it avail by whom they are inflicted.

*The explanation made by Mr. GRUNDY a few days after this speech was delivered, and his speech as published, have very much qualified the remarks which were understood to have fallen from him, and to which this reply particularly refers.

Mr. Speaker, the member from Tennessee, not satisfied with merely advancing this doctrine, has made an application of it. As I understood him, and as he was understood by gentlemen around me, he charged the whole Federal party in this country with this newly defined crime of moral treason; and being the friends of the “fast-anchored isle.” Although he did not charge the individual members of this House, it is not easily conceived how they can escape; particularly as the gentleman told us, he did not say more than he meant.

Sir I am one of this great Federal party, and I glory in being so—many of my best and dearest friends belong to this party. Many of the greatest and best men in this country are attached to this party; and whilst they continue, as they have done, to make virtue, fortitude, and intelligence their means, and their country's good their end, I hope never to forsake them. This party cannot be hurt by such attacks; to attempt to defend them would be an act of injustice. For myself and my immediate constituents, I will say: If this charge of moral treason, and being the friends of the nation with whom we are at war, is intended to be applied to myself, or a single man who voted for me, from personal or political regard, the charge is false.

SATURDAY, June 19.

THE FRENCH DECREES.

The House proceeded, immediately on its meeting to the consideration of Mr. WEBSTER's resolutions.

Mr. YANCEY said, believing as he did that, upon the question now under consideration, he should give a vote very different from many of his political friends, he begged leave briefly to state to the House the reasons which would induce him to co-operate with the gentlemen in the passage of the resolutions: it was not because he believed that there was any necessary and material information in the possession of the Executive which had not already been communicated; on the contrary, he believed that all the information upon this subject was communicated at the last session. Upon looking to the resolution offered at the last session by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, I find, said he, that all the substance of the present resolutions is embraced in that, and more especially if we take into view the answer of the President to that resolution. The resolution then adopted by the House, required that the President should inform the House at what time, and in what manner, the promulgation of the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, was announced to this Government. In answer, sir, to that resolution, it will be seen, by a reference to the Executive papers of last session, that the President transmitted to this House a letter from Mr. Barlow, of the 1st of May, 1812, to the Duke of Bassano, stating that "we know, indeed, that the French decrees do not apply to the United States;" but that the Prince Regent, in his declaration of the 21st of April, declares that they are still unrevoked; and, in order to remove all doubt upon that subject with the British Government, Mr. Barlow requested in that letter that the Duke of Bassano would furnish him with an authentic act of their revocation. It was furnished, sir, on the 10th of May, 1812, together with the decree of the 28th of April, 1811. Now, sir, though in the resolution offered by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, at the last session, it is not asked "by whom" the decree was announced to this Government; yet the answer of the President furnished the House with that fact; and it is shown by Mr. Barlow's letter of the 12th of May, communicated to the President, that the first intelligence to this Government was received from its accredited Minister. The resolution, therefore, now under consideration, does not materially differ from the one adopted at the last session; for though it was not moulded in that interrogatory form which this assumes, yet it is substantially the same. I believe, sir, the whole of the information sought for is sufficiently expressed in the first resolution, the one now under consideration; yet I shall vote for the whole of those resolutions. The last resolution, sir, I think objectionable in its phraseology, and also in its substance; but I shall give it my support. But let it be distinctly understood, at the same time, that I do not support these resolutions because I think there is any information in the possession of the Executive, which was withheld in violation of the resolution of the last session, or that any suspicion of unfairness attaches to the Administration in their foreign relations with Great Britain and France.

From the conduct of the particular friends of these resolutions during this discussion, I believe it would be a source of great gratification to them if they were rejected; and, so far, sir, as my vote goes, I am determined to disappoint them. I think it much better for the Administration that they should pass; not that I expect it will soothe the opposition, or produce any important information to the nation.

But, sir, the gentlemen on the other side of the House, not content with discussing the merits of those resolutions, have mingled in the debate our foreign relations. By way of showing the importance and value of the resolutions, and the good that will flow from them to the country, they tell us that the answer to those resolutions will show one or both of two facts, to wit: that if the French repealing decree of the 28th of April had been known to the Government before the declaration of war, it would have prevented it. And, secondly, that if this decree was not communicated to our Government before the declaration of war, (which they admit to be the fact,) then the Duke of Bassano, in his conversation with Mr. Barlow, has told a falsehood. Now, sir, permit me to remark that, if the gentlemen think it important to their cause, or are otherwise solicitous to prove a falsity on the Duke, let them do so; I want nothing to convince me of the political hypocrisy and perfidy of that Government.

Admitting that the French repealing decree had been formally communicated to this Government before the declaration of war; nay, that it had been even communicated to the British Government in April, 1811, when it purports to be dated; still he did not see how gentlemen could bring their minds to believe that that decree would have averted the war, without they knew the secrets of the British Government better than its accredited Minister; nay, without they knew the intention of that Government better than the Ministry and Prince Regent himself. And, sir, if anything can be said in addition to what was so fully illustrated the other day by the luminous argument of my political friend from Tennessee, (Mr. GRUNDY,) I beg leave to suggest it. The non-intercourse act of Congress, passed in the spring of 1810, declared that, if either Great Britain or France would repeal or so modify their decrees or Orders in Council, that they should cease to violate the neutral commerce of the United States, and the other failing to repeal her orders within three months thereafter, that the United States would take decisive steps against the one so failing to repeal. In August, 1810, the French Government, by its official act, pledged itself to our Government that the Berlin and Milan decrees were repealed, and should cease to operate on the 1st of April following. Since which time, he defied the gentlemen to show that they had been enforced by order of that Government.

Previous to this time, however, it is worthy of remark, that the British Government only required of us, that France should repeal her orders as respected the United States, and she solemnly pledged herself that she would repeal her orders, pari passu, with the repeal of the decrees as respected the United States.

But, sir, what was her conduct upon this occasion? Instead of repealing, or promise of repealing, as France had done, she advances in her doctrine, and contends that America must now procure France to repeal her decrees, not only as respected herself, but as respected all other neutral Powers.

How then, sir, might it be asked, could the promulgation of the French repealing decree have prevented the war? Would it have produced a repeal of the Orders in Council? It would not, if the British Government are to be believed. The declaration of the Prince Regent of the 21st of April; the correspondence between Mr. Foster and the Secretary of State of the 10th of June, and again on the 14th of June, a few days before the declaration of war, are conclusive on this point. But, sir, if we need better evidence to establish the fact, than the correspondence of the accredited Minister of England, permit me, sir, to refer the gentleman to the speeches of the Ministry in Parliament during the month of February, 1812; they will see, sir, that Mr. Rose and Mr. Perceval, during that discussion, which grew out of the examination and investigation of the Orders in Council in the House of Commons, have frankly and honestly acknowledged that which the gentlemen upon this occasion deny. Mr. Rose expressly says, "that they are maintained to promote the trade of England at the expense of neutrals, and as a measure of commercial rivalry with the United States." Mr. Perceval in his speech says, "that they are not only supported upon this principle of retaliation, but that this principle involved the license trade; that neither the partial nor total repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees as they related to America, or to any other nation, or all other nations, would form any claim on the British Government, while the Continental system, so called, continued in operation."

It is not unimportant, sir, in the examination of this question, to mark, that the French repealing decree was transmitted to the British Government on the 20th May, 1812, during the examination of the Orders in Council in the House of Commons. No answer, sir, is given to them (except a bare acknowledgment of their receipt) till the 23d of June following. On the 16th of June Mr. Brougham brought forward his motion for a consideration of the Orders in Council, to take place the last of the same month. In the mean time, sir, the British Ministry, consulting place and power and that democratic spirit of the manufacturing part of the community, thought it expedient to make use of the repealing decree of France as a suitable pretext, upon which to revoke their Orders in Council. It will be seen, then, sir, that I ascribe the repeal of the orders to a very different cause, than that adopted by the other side of the House. The cause undoubtedly was the extreme pressure and oppression they brought upon the manufacturing interest of the country.

He said he expected the other day, when his learned and eloquent colleague (Mr. GASTON) addressed the House, that all doubt upon this part of the subject would have been removed; that he would, as has been promised by some gentlemen on that side, demonstrate the fact, that the declaration of war depended upon the promulgation of the French repealing decree. He had expected, that if any man among them was able to establish this proposition, it was his colleague; but, sir, said he, when he embraced that part of the discussion, he exhibited himself upon a hobby too feeble to carry him, with a load too heavy to be borne by him. What, sir, was the argument he used to prove the fact? Why, that after the repealing decree was produced to Great Britain, she did repeal her orders. Yes, sir, it is true she did suspend them (or if gentlemen please repeal them) when she told you, in the same instrument, that the repeal was not such as she had before required.

I will take the liberty, sir, to remark that it is foreign from my intention to wound the feelings of any individual; but, sir, I know not how any individual, friendly to the prosecution of the war, rather than surrender rights essential to the independence of the country, can think for a moment of the observations made the other day by a member from New York, without feeling for him and his political opinions the greatest abhorrence and contempt. Upon what principle of argument or reason is it, that that member has discovered that all who aid either directly or indirectly in the prosecution of this war, are murderers!

[Here Mr. GROSVENOR, from New York, rose to explain. Mr. YANCEY informed him that he did not allude to him, and proceeded.]

Had that gentleman considered, sir, that there were other persons from New York who had taken part in this debate, he might have saved himself the trouble of rising.

The same member (Mr. SHEPHERD) has asked triumphantly for what are we fighting? If it were butterflies? I had supposed, Mr. Speaker, from the number of law-speeches he had made this session, his legal knowledge would have taught him to discriminate between the rights of butterflies, and the rights of men. But, sir, permit me to inform the gentleman, that we are prosecuting this war for the rights of seamen, and I hope, sir, we shall continue to do so, till they are established upon a principle that will do equal justice to ourselves and to others.

Mr. SHARP said, it was not his intention to have troubled the House with a single remark on the subject before them. He should have been content with giving a silent vote, had not the range of debate led into a full view of the conduct of the Administration in relation to the war. Intending to vote for all except the last of the resolutions, it became his duty to assign his reasons; as they were directly opposite to those of other gentlemen who advocated them. Some gentlemen, said he, have, for the first time during this Administration, become the supporters of the character of the nation; although not insensible to the cause of the discussion, and the effect it is intended to have, yet I am pleased to discover that such is the ground they are driven to take to obtain their object. On former occasions, those who styled themselves "friends to peace," contended that our Government waged war from a predilection to France; and we were entertained with their eloquence, displayed in comparing the nature and extent of injuries from each belligerent, France and England. The ruler of the first was denounced as a Usurper, a Despot, and a Tyrant; and the other triumphantly represented as defending our Holy Religion, as fighting the cause of Humanity and the World. Whether a ground that has afforded so much food for declamation hitherto, has been silently abandoned because it has ceased to have any effect upon the nation, and recoils upon those who resort to it; or because that magnanimous Government, finding it necessary in so great and good a cause to engage her barbarous allies on our exposed frontiers indiscriminately to murder, disregarding age or sex; and had placed the trophies of savage warfare, a human scalp, over the mace of their Legislative Council at York, representing that an authorized system of rapine and murder was interwoven with the genius of their Government; whether this occasioned the change, I leave others to decide.

I will consider this subject, sir, in the form in which it has been presented; and first, as to the avowed object of the resolutions. We learn from the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) and the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR,) that they are intended to support the honor of our country. Who can object to it? But how? By proving to the world that in a correspondence between Mr. Barlow, our Minister to France, and the Duke of Bassano, in May, 1812, the French Minister of Foreign Relations was guilty of asserting a falsehood; and that the decree of the Government of France, bearing date on the 28th of April, 1811, repealing the Berlin and Milan decrees, never was communicated to our Government until it was communicated through Mr. Barlow. Let it be admitted that the decree of the 28th April, 1811, never was communicated to our Government previous to the mission of Mr. Barlow. The gentlemen say so, and at once acquit our Government of all charge of duplicity or concealment. But they also contend that, had the decree of the 28th April, 1811, as the Duke of Bassano stated to Mr. Barlow, been communicated to our Government at the time it bears date, and by our Government been made known to England, she would have repealed her Orders in Council and we have had no war with her. To make good a position of that kind, those who assume it must have a knowledge of the temper of the British Government beyond what they have ever communicated to the public; and, so far as the assertion may depend on that sort of calculation, I should hold it wholly incontrovertible. But, if the diplomatic correspondence and public acts of the British Government are evidence against them, it is proven to a demonstration they would not have repealed their Orders in Council upon the production of the decree of 28th April, 1811.

The Prince Regent's manifesto of the 21st of April, 1812, after complaining of the injustice of France, in respect to neutrals, and excusing the course adopted by Great Britain under the plea of necessity, and as retaliatory of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, proceeds to require a repeal of those decrees as a condition precedent to the rescission of the Orders in Council—not a modification of them so as not to affect the commerce of America, but that they should cease to operate on all neutral commerce. That there should be no misunderstanding upon this subject, in the correspondence between Mr. Foster the Minister near this Government and Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, in June, 1812, Mr. Foster expressly states that nothing less than a full and unconditional repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan would induce his Government to repeal her Orders in Council; that Great Britain could not repeal her Orders in Council as it respected America, and leave them in force against other States, upon condition that France would except America singly and specially from the operation of her decrees. The relaxation or modification of those decrees is considered insufficient. America is not only to obtain from France the freedom of her own commerce, but she is required to contend for the commerce of others. She is not only to cause her own rights to be respected, but she must be the guardian of the rights of all neutral nations. Are gentlemen prepared to say America should have interposed in behalf of the rights of all the neutral world? Upon what honorable pretence could America contend for the redress of injuries other than her own; and more especially whilst Great Britain withheld a redress of the outrages she was daily committing upon our citizens?

The gentleman from New York (Mr. GROSVENOR) and the gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON) tell us, that the British Government, on the 23d of June, 1812, by the repeal of their Orders in Council, afforded sufficient evidence, that, had the French decree of the 28th April, 1811, been communicated at the time it bears date, that the effect would then have been the same, and that the delay of the British Government in meeting the repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan, so soon as the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, was communicated, was owing to the assassination of Mr. Perceval, the Prime Minister, which deranged the British Cabinet, and that so soon as it was organized, the repeal of the Orders in Council took place. Mr. S. said he was sorry to find, upon examination, that the gentleman's understanding of the rescission of the Orders in Council was entirely different from what that State paper, from the face of it, would warrant. In its preamble, the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, is taken notice of, and so far from considering that sufficient for the repeal of their Orders in Council, it is expressly stated, that the tenor of the decree of the 28th April, 1811, is not considered as satisfying the order of 21st April, 1812, nor such a repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan as the British Government had always required; nor would it justify the demand of the American Government, that their Orders in Council should be abandoned; nor does the order of the British Government of the 23d June, 1812, more than suspend the operation of their Orders in Council, reserving, at the same time, the express right to enforce them again whenever it should appear expedient, notwithstanding the decree of the 28th of April, 1811. This paper of the British Cabinet, suspending their Orders in Council, relied upon by the gentlemen themselves, goes incontestably to confirm what was meant by Mr. Foster, when he required a full and unconditional repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and declared that a repeal, as it respected America, would not do—but it must be general as it regards all neutrals. As the French decree of the 28th of April, 1811, is not the reason of the suspension of the Orders in Council on the 23d of June, 1812, we are led to inquire what were the causes that produced it. They are best discovered in the policy of that nation. Ever in the habit of considering her interest, she has long since become insensible to those principles of justice that should as invariably govern nations as individuals. Feeling her ascendancy upon the ocean, her avarice would not suffer her to brook a rival. The unparalleled prosperity of American commerce soon excited her jealousy; and with the commencement of our present Government commenced the history of her injuries and injustice towards us. The annals of our diplomacy, for a period of above twenty years, exhibit complaints of the plunder of our property and the impressment of our citizens upon the high seas. With Great Britain, the generous spirit of commercial enterprise is converted into a system of piracy and plunder, sanctioned by the highest authorities of the Government. Emboldened by our long forbearance; encouraged by the strong opposition in our own country to avenging her injuries; and calculating on the want of unanimity in our councils, Great Britain was induced to believe this Government wanted energy to commence and prosecute a war. Thus she was induced to conceive the design, by her Orders in Council, of sweeping our commerce from the ocean and enriching her Navy with the spoils. Nor did she once think of abandoning that policy, until, when too late, it was apprehended war must be the result of the state of things in America. Gentlemen may talk about French perfidy as the cause of this war. Let me assure them the canker lies nearer home. The injuries and injustice of Britain were the immediate cause. Yet, I have no doubt, those in our own country, who induced a belief that we wanted unanimity and energy to right our wrongs and support our sovereignty as a nation, are highly culpable.

Mr. S. said he could not see that gentlemen would gain or lose much by admitting, as is contended, that the duplicity of France in concealing the decree of the 28th of April, 1811, repealing the Berlin and Milan decrees, had a tendency to confirm Great Britain in the course of injustice she was pursuing towards America. If such an admission does not go to deny or palliate her conduct, neither does it inculpate our Government. It barely accounts for the conduct of Great Britain, and in a way that does no credit to her justice or sagacity. Great Britain is charged with plundering our commerce—and her apology is, that France deceived her, for she thought France did the same. Then, say the gentlemen, had Great Britain known France had repealed the Berlin and Milan decrees, she would have repealed her Orders in Council, and we should have had no war. To that I reply, had Great Britain never adopted a system of piracy and plunder of our property, and impressment of our citizens upon the ocean, we should have had no war; or, to state the facts, if that party in our own country who style themselves "the friends of peace," had not induced Great Britain to believe we were too divided in our councils to prosecute a war in defence of our rights, she would not have continued her aggressions on our commerce, and we should have had no war. What do such arguments prove? nothing more nor less than that the injustice of Britain has forced this war upon America. But it is far from throwing even a shade of blame upon the conduct of our own Government. No one has, nor do I believe any gentleman will venture to assert, that Great Britain has not given us just cause of war, or that America has been precipitated rashly or inconsiderately into this contest. On her part, it is the result of necessity; it is a contest in defence of her commerce and her citizens, and involves her independence as a nation.

This brings me, sir, to the most interesting part of the debate. We are now at war with a most potent and perfidious enemy. Enlightened politicians of all ages and countries agree, that the vigorous prosecution of a war, by calling into action the resources and energies of a nation, is the only certain means of procuring an indemnity for injuries and security for our rights, in a steady and honorable peace. So far as any gentleman's arguments go to contravene that course of policy, by disaffecting the people of this nation to their Government, and by their opposition to the ways and means of carrying on this war, to paralyze the Administration in their endeavors to bring it to a prosperous and happy termination, I feel alarmed at the consequence, and must entreat gentlemen to consider what will be the tendency of such doctrines. The gentleman from New York, (Mr. SHEPHERD,) yesterday, on this floor, denounced the present war as unjust, and said his conscience would not suffer him to take a part in it; that he should deem himself guilty of murder if he did. For the honor of the gentleman, I will not believe that sentiment to have been matured by reflection—I am necessitated to inculcate his head, to do justice to his heart. Will he reflect but one moment, that although he may differ with the Government on the causes that produced this war; although he may believe the enemy had a prescriptive right to plunder our ships and impress our seamen; yet, this is a Government of laws, enacted by the constituted authorities, where the majority rules. This Government has, by its legitimate act, declared war with Great Britain. Have the minority a right to oppose that war, and bring disaster and disgrace upon their country? He who opposes the adoption of injudicious measures, is a patriot—those measures once adopted, to oppose their execution is rebellion. If to meet our enemies on the field of battle be murder, what crime is he guilty of who can tamely see a frontier of five hundred miles smoking with the blood of his fellow-citizens, and the only remaining inhabitants flying by the light of the conflagration of their dwellings, and would refuse to contribute to their protection? His crime must be treason against humanity.

The same honorable gentleman has said we are indebted to the enemy for their humanity and forbearance. Yes, Mr. Speaker, when we reflect on their wantonly consigning private property to the flames, in their destruction of our villages on the seaboard; when we recollect their giving up the wounded and prisoners taken at the defeat of General Winchester to be scalped and tomahawked by their Indian allies; when we see them side by side with savages, traversing the borders of our country, leaving the dwellings of our fellow-citizens a heap of ashes slaked with human gore, we are made to exclaim, If this be their tender mercies, good Lord deliver us from their wrath!

We are also told by the same honorable gentleman, that the Government has at last to depend upon the Federalists for funds to support this war; that the loans were all obtained from them; he was sorry any would contribute to so unjust a war, and he hoped they never would be paid by the Government. Mr. S. said he could by no means admit the fact of the Federalists filling up the loan, for he was well informed that gentlemen of both sides in politics had contributed largely in loans to the Government, and that he was happy in believing there were many whose politics were Federal that are true friends to their country. But, said he, I would not believe until I heard it, that it would be contended by any one on this floor, that money borrowed by the Government, under legal authority, on any change of Administration or policy, ought not to be paid. When my country shall become so insensible to every principle of justice and honesty as to refuse to pay her just debts, I trust in God I may not be disgraced by being called her citizen. No doubt for the purpose of giving weight to such doctrine the gentleman from New York (Mr. SHIPHERD) boasts that Massachusetts, Connecticut, and New York, were the foremost in the struggle for independence. It is well the gentleman named other States besides his own; but why he has overlooked the two very respectable States of Pennsylvania and Virginia, I am at a loss to tell. Those patriots and heroes who were foremost in the Revolution we honor as our country ought. But, alas! with the mutations of time they have passed away, and have left another race upon the stage. Massachusetts, the cradle of liberty! we inquire for your sages and heroes; we ask, where are they? and are answered only by the echo of our voice, repeating "where are they?" The same honorable gentleman, and the gentleman from North Carolina, (Mr. GASTON,) press this subject home, and tell us their fathers fought and bled during the Revolutionary contest for liberty; inferring that with sires so distinguished the sons should not easily be suspected of error.

But, sir, my perception of the right to inherit either the honors or the talents of an ancestor is so indistinct that we may very readily imagine that it might or might not happen. I am warranted from history in stating a case—such I hope does not exist in our own country: Brutus, the first distinguished patriot of that name in Rome, in no long time after driving the tyrant into banishment, had to sit in judgment on his own sons for treason. The illustrious father is not unfrequently cursed with a degenerate son. He who has worn out his life in the service of his country, and by his wisdom and valor rendered himself conspicuous in achieving her liberty and advancing her happiness, is entitled to the most exalted niche in the temple of fame; nor less distinguished he, who, in the ensanguined field, is sacrificed among a hecatomb of victims on the altar of his country's rights:

"Fresh leaves of martial laurel Shall shade the soldier's grave,
Who dies with arm uplifted
His country's rights to save!"

But the chaplet of flowers that adorned his silver locks would wither and decay on the brow of his son, unless cherished by the same virtues. Could the spirit of the departed sire converse with his son, he would point to the most exalted eminences of his country's promotion, and say, Son, climb there by understanding and promoting your country's weal, and you may gather laurels from those cloud-capt summits that will grow and flourish as long as you deserve to wear them. But, if you refuse to emulate your father's example, the lustre of his character will only throw upon your conduct a shade of opprobrium. Observation and history lead to this conclusion: that every one acts from his own judgment, and should receive the fame or infamy due to his own conduct.

Sir, when we reflect that this nation is now engaged in war, the object of the early meeting of this session of Congress will immediately occur. The ways and means for carrying on the war are imperiously demanded of us; to meet that object should be our first duty; and I had hoped no subject disconnected with it would have occupied the House; and much less could I have imagined several days would have been employed in investigating the causes that produced the war, at a period when it is a year since it was declared. The arguments of gentlemen in the opposition might have been serviceable at the time that subject was on the tapis, and I believe they were then urged, duly considered, and weighed before our Government acted. All arguments should be now applied to the present state of the Union, to the effectual means of bringing this war to a happy and honorable termination. Mr. S. said, he hoped at least we should all unite in feeling an interest in the fortune and happiness of our own country, and in adopting the means necessary to that end.

Mr. MURFEE said, that he was desirous of speaking on this question, for several reasons; one was, that being unaccustomed to deliver his sentiments in deliberative bodies, he might possibly extend his remarks to everything else but the issue in controversy, and in that event would have the good fortune to find himself in company with many honorable gentlemen of the other side of the House. Indeed, if he wandered ever so far from the subject, he had the sufficient apology to offer, that he was but retracing those steps from which his eloquent colleague had lately brushed away the dust. He considered the debate, also, of a nature highly interesting to the whole community. The justice and expediency of the war are considered as coming within the scope of the resolutions upon the table, and the arguments of those who commenced it and advocate its continuance, contrasted with the objections of the opposition, will thus be fairly presented to the view of the people of the United States. It will be their province to decide in favor of the one or the other, and such decision is, at this time, not less desirable than necessary. If their determination shall be in our favor, and that of the war, it is to be hoped it would lead to an union of parties in its prosecution, that will tend not less certainly to a speedy than glorious conclusion. If, on the contrary, it shall be condemned by them as unjust and unnecessary, it will become us to acquiesce in their will, and obtain the most advantageous terms of peace that may be granted by the enemy to an humble and submissive acknowledgment of our error.

The discussion upon this subject is susceptible of being reduced to a single point. The decree of the French Government, formally repealing the Berlin and Milan decrees, so far as they affected the United States, purports to bear date the 28th April, 1811. It does not appear that this instrument was ever published, or that it was made known to the American Minister until May, 1812, and by him transmitted to his Government. No one has spoken but disclaimed the idea that it ever was known to the Executive of this country prior to that period. In the conversation of Mr. Barlow with the Duke of Bassano, on the 12th May, the latter stated that this decree had been communicated to Mr. Barlow's predecessor at his Court, and also to the French Minister at this place, with orders to transmit it to the Secretary of State. Now, sir, the gentlemen on the other side say, if it was communicated to the President in either way previous to the declaration of war, and by him concealed, no language is capable of depicting the aggravated crime of which he has been guilty. For, if this decree had been made known, the Orders in Council would have been repealed, and this disastrous war, as they style it, never have taken place. To vindicate the honor of the Administration and attach the falsehood where it justly belongs, is the professed object of these resolutions. But, sir, we say that, admitting what no one believes or pretends to believe, that it was so concealed by the Administration, still we say, had it been presented to the British Ministry, it would not have had the least possible effect in suspending or arresting the war.

The French decree of 28th April, 1811, repeals the Berlin and Milan decrees so far only as they affected the United States. The precise words are, that they "are considered as not having existed in regard to American vessels." If we refer to the whole correspondence between the British and American Ministers, it will plainly appear that this was not such a repeal of the decrees as they required us to produce previous to rescinding their obnoxious edicts. In order not to detain the House by particular references to documents, which have been so much canvassed, I will content myself with recalling to their recollection two or three of the last letters, in which their demands are so explicitly avowed as to be impossible to be mistaken or misunderstood. In a letter from Lord Wellesley to Mr. Pinkney, of 11th February, 1811, he demanded their absolute and unconditional repeal, not as they affected the United States, but as they regarded all nations; that the commerce of the Continent thereby be restored to the same situation in which it stood previous to their promulgation. As they affected others, we never did or could justly have the least right to interfere.

In a short time after, Mr. Foster in his letter to the Secretary of State, on 3d July, 1811, repeats the same demand in almost the same words, and to that he still more unequivocally answered the additional stipulation, that the neutral commerce should be restored to its former situation. This latter demand, in reality, was, and it could be nothing less, considered as a requisition of us to enforce the admission of British goods into those ports of the Continent, which had been subsequently subjugated by the French arms. Accordingly, the Secretary of State, in reply, expressed his astonishment at a demand so unusual and unexpected, and desired an explicit answer, whether such an extravagant pretension was maintained by the British Government. In his answer to this, Mr. Foster labors to distinguish what he meant from the inference so easily deducible, not only from the former, but that very letter, and finally envelopes himself in those high-sounding epithets he could assume with so much facility when he speaks of the honor and dignity of the British nation.

If, sir, additional evidence were wanted in so plain a case, I would refer to the last letter of the 10th June, 1812, conclusive of the point, and sufficient to carry conviction to the most sceptical mind. In this memorable letter, written a few days previous to the declaration of war, which was and must have been known to him would follow in that short space, it is to be presumed he would tender the most favorable terms he was authorized, if his Government had been sincerely desirous of adjusting amicably the subsisting differences. From this letter alone, sufficient to silence forever the cavils of the most incredulous, I will conclude this point by reading a short passage: "I have no hesitation, sir, in saying that Great Britain never did, or could, engage to repeal her orders as affecting America alone, leaving them in force against other States, upon condition that France would except singly and specially America from the operation of her decrees."

I will now, sir, proceed to inquire what answer has been given to these facts by the two gentlemen who have stood forward the most conspicuous advocates of the resolutions upon the table. The honorable member from New York has remarked that they are so confused and indistinct that he is unable to understand them. How poor an evasion! how little applicable to expressions, not merely as intelligible, but the most forcible of which the language is susceptible! From the gallant manner in which that gentleman presented himself in the van of the Federal phalanx, I did not expect to hear so humiliating an acknowledgment of his own defeat. The honorable gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. GASTON) declines to take this ground, and displays his superior address by attracting the attention to another view of the subject. He attributes the clear light in which he was compelled to acknowledge that Mr. Foster did place the ultimatum of his Government to the superior diplomatic skill of the American Secretary. This unwilling testimony to the merit of that gentleman was as unexpected as just, and with the same candor, the honorable gentleman might have added, that he is not more distinguished in this correspondence for superior strength of argument and elegance of style, than he is elevated by honesty and integrity above Mr. Foster, or any other corrupted minion of British power. The honorable member sickened with the repetition of these documents, and turned from them with disgust, to take a comprehensive view of the political controversy between the two countries. The gentleman was right; in minute detail there was danger; a rigid examination of them would have presented him with facts and arguments impossible to be answered, and which would surpass even his ingenuity to elude. Many others, like himself, have sickened in the perusal, because they place the Administration upon the high and commanding ground they deserve to occupy.

The honorable gentleman from North Carolina infers that they did intend to repeal their Orders in Council had they been furnished with an authentic repeal of the French decrees, because they actually did subsequently repeal them on that ground. But, sir, how was it possible for the Administration to have foreseen so complete a revolution in their designs within so short a period, expressly contrary to their declaration at various times and by so many different persons? We judge of the future actions of men by their professions, and to me the logic is incomprehensible by which we prove a man will perform an act which he declares he will not, merely because, influenced by new reasons, he may subsequently do that very act. It is a useless waste of time to argue further upon this point. That the British Cabinet requires the absolute and unconditional repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees and the restoration of the commerce of the Continent to its former situation, is proved by the declaration of the Prime Minister himself, by the instructions to the Resident Minister, by all the letters of the latter, and finally by the declaration of the Prince Regent himself.

But, sir, I never believed that it was their intention to rescind the Orders in Council if we could have performed the stipulation they required. In the early correspondence upon the subject, they justified them upon the ground of retaliation, and professed their readiness to proceed step by step with the French Government in the repeal of such as affected the commerce of the United States. From this ground they afterwards receded, and annexed the other condition to which I have before alluded. Finally, in the debate in the House of Commons on the 3d of March, what I have no doubt was the original object of the Orders in Council was no longer concealed. It was then substantially avowed by the Minister himself, that they were supported as a system of commercial monopoly which they had the power to enforce, and as a benefit they expected to derive from their naval supremacy.

The honorable gentlemen on the other side have liberally indulged in invective against the Ruler of the French Empire. I sincerely approve their sentiments, and fervently wish a hatred of kings and royalty may be indelibly impressed upon the heart of every American. I most cordially unite with them in an abhorrence of Emperors, over whatever country they may lord it, and by whatever appellation distinguished, whether Napoleon the Conqueror, or Alexander the Deliverer. I am equally indifferent to the personal fate of the Emperor of France, or that of his Empire, whether he fall by the dagger of a Parisian conscript, or be pierced by the lance of a wild and warlike Cossack. And, so far as my country be unaffected, I care not whether his Empire be tumbled into ruin, or whether he still have ability to drive back the torrent of Northern barbarians by whom he is surrounded into their native deserts.

As many gentlemen on the other side have still to speak upon this subject, permit me to point out an object to which they may, with equal justice, direct their arrows. The honorable gentlemen may select from the catalogue of vices which have disgraced human nature in public or private life, and a corresponding one will be found to constitute a part of the character of the Prince Regent. This rich and fertile field has been left untouched. The gentlemen have asked why no notice has been taken, not a censure breathed against the wrongs and violence of the Emperor of France. As this surely cannot apply to me, I have the right to retort the inquiry. Why has the conduct of the Regent of England been passed over in silence? That man whose arrogant pretension and long continued injustice reduced us to the alternative of encountering the calamities of war or submitting to national degradation and dishonor. An honorable gentleman from New York (Mr. SHIPHERD) has stigmatized the war as a murderous project, and expressed his hopes and wishes that the money loaned for its support would never be repaid. A venerable member of this House has gone still further, publicly charges the Administration with bribery in procuring the late loans, and declared it the duty of upright men in a future Legislature to refuse provision for a fulfilment of these usurious contracts. Must not all regret, deplore the frailty of human nature to see that gentleman, influenced by party spirit, tarnish the laurels of his youth, and in the decline of life consent to abandon those very rights he himself maintained by his pen and defended by his sword!

I am pleased, sir, that the sentiments and designs of the Opposition are thus openly avowed to the world. And, sir, I will take the liberty to inform the gentleman from New York, (Mr. GROSVENOR), that feeble as the Administration may be, and poorly as he may think of them, while such are the opinions of himself and his friends, they will never drive us from our seats.

In conclusion I will again press the question propounded by my honorable friend from Tennessee (Mr. GRUNDY.) The orders are repealed, and will you have peace and recognise the right of impressment? To this no answer has been given, and I venture to declare that none will be given in the affirmative. How, then, will gentlemen justify it to themselves and the people, if they will neither surrender the claim we assert, nor aid the prosecution of a war in its support? I will, sir, give my vote for the resolutions, except the last, with which we have no concern, for information upon this subject, in this or any other, the most inquisitorial shape they can be made to assume. Because I am well assured that they can but add to the numberless proofs already afforded, that the Government of the United States preferred an honorable struggle to a tame surrender of the rights of an independent nation.

When Mr. MURFREE concluded, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, JUNE 21.

Another member, to wit: from New York, JOHN M. BOWERS, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Commissioner of the General Land Office, transmitting the reports of the land commissioners for the western district of the late Territory of Orleans, now State of Mississippi; which were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to reward the officers and crew of the United States ship Hornet.

The amount of compensation was, on motion of Mr. NELSON, fixed at $25,000—the same as was allowed to the officers and crew of the Wasp, for the capture of the Frolic. The bill was then reported to the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate for the relief of Thomas Sloo; which was gone through, reported to the House, and ordered to be read a third time this day; and was accordingly read a third time, and passed.

FRENCH DECREES.

The order of the day on Mr. WEBSTER's resolutions having been called up,

Mr. BIBB stated the intention of the Committee of Ways and Means to press the consideration of the revenue bills as soon as possible. The time already occupied in this debate had not been thrown away, as the Committee of Ways and Means were not prepared for the discussion of the tax bills. Now they were ready, however, he rose, in the absence of the chairman of the committee, (Mr. ERRIS), to give notice that those bills would be called up to-morrow; and, every gentleman now having fair notice, he hoped the discussion of these resolutions would terminate to-day.

Mr. CALHOUN made some observations expressive of his wish to curtail this debate, so anxious was he to come to the discussion of the ways and means; with which view, he should refrain from making those remarks on this occasion which he had intended, and should, if the motion for indefinite postponement was withdrawn, also withdraw the motion which he had made to amend the resolution.

Mr. FARROW then withdrew his motion for indefinite postponement, in order to save time, although he remained decidedly opposed to the resolutions; to which, looking at their object and expediency, nothing could reconcile him.

Mr. CALHOUN then withdrew his motion for amendment.

Mr. ROBERTSON assigned at length the reasons why, although he believed these resolutions wholly unnecessary, he should nevertheless be induced to vote for them.

The question was then taken on agreeing to the first resolution, as follows:

“Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform this House, unless the public interest should in his opinion forbid such communication, when, by whom, and in what manner, the first intelligence was given to this Government of the decree of the Government of France, bearing date on the 28th April, 1811, and purporting to be a definitive repeal of the decrees of Berlin and Milan.”

And passed in the affirmative—yeas 137, nays 26, as follows:

The second resolution having been read—

Mr. BUTLER rose, and said, so long as he entertained a hope that these resolutions would meet the fate they so richly deserved, he felt willing to give a silent vote; but having lost all expectation of a result so desirable, it was proper to render some reasons for voting in the negative.

Sir, said Mr. B., I see no necessity for the information required, and to call on the President for documents that can be of no use would be improper. We may ask for information without giving the President the reasons, but we certainly ought to have good reasons ourselves for so doing. It has not been once intimated, that any act of the Legislature can be founded on the answer expected; much less that we should now declare war against France; I therefore can discover no profitable use that can be made of any answer in the power of the President to give.

It has been said that this inquiry ought to have been made by the friends of the Administration; but as they have neglected their duty, these resolutions were introduced to give the President a fair opportunity, by his answer, to remove the suspicions under which many of the people are laboring.

Sir, if that unfortunate class of the community had believed the most solemn assertions of the President, or even their own senses in relation to his conduct for forty years past, they would not now be laboring under these painful suspicions. As no part of his conduct has laid the foundation for, or given any support to these suspicions, nothing that he can do, nothing that he can place on paper will remove them. Should the President give the most satisfactory answer, it would only leave his character on the same high ground on which it now stands, and therefore would contribute nothing to his reputation. I have another reason for voting against the adoption of these resolutions. The same inquiry was made by the last Congress, and received the answer of the President. And will you now repeat the same question in the most inquisitive language? Will you treat the President of the United States in a manner that would be resented by almost every man in private life? Strange marks of distrust and suspicion are to be seen on the very face of these resolutions; the time and manner in which they make their appearance also go to support the same opinions. I consider the introduction of these resolutions an attack upon the Executive of this nation; and when you have made them your own, if I am not mistaken, the world will consider it as made by this House.

Sir, the five resolutions you have had under consideration about a week, appear all to be nearly related in form and spirit, and as you have adopted the first, the others will follow of course: but if they pass, it must be by the votes of those who are moved by motives that shall not influence me; I will not vote for resolutions that I disapprove, merely to gratify those whom I am persuaded cannot be conciliated. The fear of being accused of having an intention to suppress useful information, will not move me. Conscious of the rectitude of my own intentions, I shall give no vote through fear of accusations founded in falsehood.

We have been told that the time spent in this debate has not been lost: if it has not been worse than lost, it will hereafter give me pleasure to acknowledge my own error.

Inquiries as necessary as this might be instituted, one upon the back of another, without end. Why not call on the President to lay before this House such information as he may possess in relation to the powers Mr. Erskine had to make an arrangement with our Government concerning the British Orders in Council? That Minister in the plainest terms declared that he had full power to do what he proposed; his master at home, within three months, in terms equally plain, contradicted him: one might speak truth—both could not. And why shall we not inquire after the fact? The reason is obvious—because it would answer no valuable purpose: but you will give me leave to say, that it would answer as good a purpose as the one now under consideration.

Sir, I have been in the habit of viewing every man responsible for his own conduct; and this in legislation as elsewhere. And although it is the lot of man to err, it is not to be expected that honest wise men will always be unable to foresee the natural tendency of their own conduct in the plainest cases. If my conduct is such as can produce no other consequences but those that are bad—and this so plain that every person of sane mind must discern it—to what will you ascribe my improper behaviour? To the want of good motives, or the want of discernment? One or the other must be the cause. I have been taught to ascribe no improper motive to any member of this House. I shall be one of the last to transgress your rules; but they will prevent no one from inquiring after the effects of any measure proposed to the House, or of the tendency of the arguments in support of that measure.

As to the motives of the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, who introduced all these resolutions, I shall say nothing; I shall treat with equal charity all the arguments offered in their favor. It is sufficient for me to be fully satisfied that they can produce no other consequences than those that are to be deeply lamented. According to all the arguments advanced by gentlemen on the other side of the House, it would appear that either the Government of France, or that of the United States, is responsible for all the blood and treasure that may be wasted in our war with Great Britain. They might as well say, in plain English, that the President and the majority in Congress have been the sole cause of the war. It is only a circuitous course taken to enforce the charge with more effect. Through you all the people of the United States may be told this, and much sophistry urged to support it. I shall not say that the motives were bad; but that the effect must be so, is certain.

So far as they are believed, and have any influence, they must engage the people to search for the causes of this war, where they are not to be found, and where they never did exist. By the resolutions, and the arguments in their support, Great Britain seems to be kept almost out of sight, as having little or nothing to do with the causes of the war; and if this had been the real design of gentlemen, they could scarcely have pursued a course better shapen. If an inquiry is to be made after the causes of this war, it ought to be this, whether ourselves or Great Britain are in the wrong: but instead of this, our own Government is boldly charged with murder.

Mr. SHIPHARD.—I wish to explain, sir. I did not say that the friends of the war were murderers. I said I would not enter into the murderous project.

Mr. BUTLER.—I believe I understand the gentleman. If the project is a murderous one, and any person falls in the contest, he is murdered: the inquiry then is, who are the murderers?

The gentleman does not surely mean to assail those who opposed the war; he must have referred to our own Government, and those that have supported it. And notwithstanding these daring charges that have been made or intimated—all from the same side of the House where the resolutions originated—you are told in the same breath, that all this is to save the reputation of your President. Sir, can any man, or set of men, be so mistaken as to the effects of the course they pursue?—but their motives I shall not call in question.

But, sir, no friend to our country will doubt, no man of sane mind can refuse his assent to the belief, that such arguments will tend directly to increase party spirit—inflame the public mind—create distrust in the Government—prepare the people for civil commotion, with all its concomitant evils—strengthen the hands of our enemies, and weaken the arms of our own Government. These are some of the natural consequences of such arguments, as have been advanced in favor of your resolutions, so far as they gain credit.

In the course of this debate, you have been told of the forbearance and benevolence of the British in their conduct towards our country, since the commencement of the present war. Sir, if you will turn your thoughts and eyes upon those lonely chimneys of private houses, so recently burnt that the bricks are scarcely cold, and take into view the slaughtered, defenceless women and children, together with the plundering of private property, both by themselves and spies, on the Atlantic and Western frontier, these facts will afford but little evidence of their humanity, justice, or even honorable warfare.

According to the opinion of some gentlemen, of very high standing in our country, the moral complexion of the British Government has been strangely changed for the better within thirty or forty years past. Our fathers, then, with GEORGE WASHINGTON at their head, considered that Government as totally depraved, as destitute of all political honesty, as altogether unfit to govern any people, and much less to be admired as freemen. Look at your Declaration of Independence; examine your ancient record; and there you will see the political character of that Government portrayed in true colors. And let me ask, when was that Government regenerated? When have they become better? They have stolen many, and murdered others, that you were bound to protect; and by the hand of savages, with the tomahawk and scalping-knife, they have slaughtered your defenceless men, women, and children, in time of peace. There is no crime of which she is not guilty. She can smile in your face, and with words smoother than oil, when she has caught your eye with her own, aim a dagger at your heart.

To that Government, to that sink of all political, as well as moral depravity, may be traced all the causes of this war. Evidence for many years past has been given by that Government of intentions to effect that by art and corruption which she could not accomplish by her arms.

Mr. Speaker, I have paid particular attention to the correspondence of that Government with our own, for several years past; and feel fully persuaded that that Government has assumed to itself principles and rights, which, if suffered to grow into national law, would leave us in no better circumstances than colonies to that Power.

I am not insensible that many sentences and much of the reasoning appears to be inconsistent with itself, so much so, that even on this floor it seems not to be understood by all: but as all that rubbish was only designed to employ the ignorant, and give better success to secret emissaries in deceiving the people of this country; it becomes you to remove the whole of it, and look at the essence of all she has said, naked and uncovered.

She tells you that no arrangement can be made to prevent your seamen from impressment.

She does not say that she will; but says nothing can be done to prevent it; and has continued the practice of stealing them for more than twenty years. Sir, in relation to this subject, that Government has treated you in the same manner that an old bully would the honest simpleton intended for abuse. According to the law of Moses, the man-stealer was to be put to death: if war can in any case be justified, it may be your duty to put that law in execution so far as you have power.

That Government has not only assumed the right to supply her navy with your seamen, whenever it may suit her convenience, and they can be found within her power; but she has also assumed the right to govern your commerce on the high seas, in the same manner as though you were a colony of that Kingdom.

Sir, what is the language of that Government on this subject? It is this: You may trade in any place where our merchandise can be sold; and nowhere else. This, sir, is the substance of all the lengthy, tedious, labored communications of that Government to ours, for several years past, on the subject of commerce. And although she has for several years been practising this system of rapine and piracy, yet we are whiningly told she means no such thing.

The causes of this are too apparent not to be seen: but it affords no matter of surprise, that you should be told that this war is unnecessary and unjust, by gentlemen who are searching for its causes in the Government of France or that of the United States, where they never will be found. Let them turn their eyes to the British Government; let them examine the conduct of her Ministry; they will then see that you have as just cause for this war, as there ever was for any upon earth.

Sir, after having heard so many charges brought against our own Government, it may not be improper to inquire whether individuals in our country may not be, in one degree, chargeable with the consequences of this war. And in order to this, I will call your attention to two or three notorious facts. Near the commencement of that Congress, who afterwards declared war to exist, a number of resolutions were introduced, authorizing preparations for war. Those resolutions were adopted almost unanimously by this House. The opinion of the Senate and of the President were also known. The faith of this Government was now pledged to resist the encroachments of Great Britain unless she should abandon the ground she has taken, before we were prepared to resist her. This ought to have put all contention to rest; the benefits that would result to our country from union, must be obvious to all.

But here, sir, you find yourself in open view of conduct long to be lamented—conduct that must kindle emotions of shame, grief, and anger. You were told to your face, that there was no sincerity in your words and acts; that all was meant only to deceive, delude, and scare. That the British had nothing to fear, and our own country nothing to hope, from those in power. That you had not the least intention to declare war. That you had become too tame to resent any injury however great. That you could not be kicked into a war.

Sentiments like these were uttered in the presence of the British Minister; in the face of the nation; the same was soon heard in the hall of the British Parliament. Letters were sent by members of your own body, to many parts of our own country, disseminating the same sentiments. Many editors were also engaged in the same work.

No exertions were wanting. Every nerve was strained to divide the people, increase party spirit and prepare all for disappointment—to persuade Great Britain to believe that you had become too senseless to know your rights, and too divided to defend them. That this was the course pursued by many, for three or four months before the declaration of war, is too notorious to be denied by any one in his right mind; and the individuals engaged in this work, are also well known in every part of our country. Sir, you will now permit me to ask you one or two questions. Do you not believe that the conduct just mentioned was an encouragement to Great Britain to persist in her aggressions on your rights? Do you believe that Great Britain would have continued trampling on your rights if our country had been united to a man in the support of our own Government? Would she have risked a war with this country under such circumstances? She would not. And for the correctness of this answer, I appeal to the conscience of every member of this House.

Sir, as but one answer can be given to questions so plain, it is left with you and the nation to decide who in our own country ought to be considered as responsible for the consequences of the war in which you are engaged.

I have stated some of my reasons for voting against the resolutions before you, and some of the objections I have against the arguments advanced in their favor. I shall now submit to your decision, whatever it may be, when I have placed my name where it will forever be pleasing to have it standing. Neither am I troubled at the thoughts of being in a minority; for, sir, I would give my vote in the negative, did I know it would stand entirely alone.

The question was then taken to agree to the second resolution, as originally proposed, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 137, nays 29, as follows:

The fifth resolution being amended by inserting after the word "President," the words "unless the public interest should forbid such a disclosure," the question was taken to agree to that resolution, with the said amendment, and also passed in the affirmative—yeas 93, nays 68, as follows:

New York Contested Election.

JUNE, 1813.

Virginia, Stanford, Strong, Tannehill, Telfair, Troup, and Wilson of Pennsylvania.

Mr. WEBSTER, and Mr. RHEA of Tennessee, were appointed a committee to present the said resolutions to the President of the United States.

On motion of Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee,
Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to transmit to this House copies of a Declaration and Orders in Council of the British Government, of the 21st of April, 1812, and of a copy of a note from Lord Castlereagh, being the same papers alluded to in a letter from Mr. Russell to the Secretary of State, of the 26th of April, 1812.

Ordered, That the committee appointed to present to the President the resolutions herein before mentioned, do also present the last resolution aforesaid to the President.

NORTHWESTERN FRONTIER.

Mr. KILBOURN offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and if any what, provision ought to be made for the more effectual and economical protection of the Northwestern frontier against the incursions of savages and other enemies, by granting donations of land to actual settlers on land adjoining the Northern and Western boundary of the State of Ohio, and of the Territories of Indiana and Illinois.

Mr. FISK moved to amend the resolution, so as to refer the subject to the Military Committee; when (it being late) a motion was made to adjourn, and carried—51 to 46.

THURSDAY, June 22.

Another member, to wit: WILLIAM M. RICHARDSON, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. MILLER presented a petition of Theophilus Barbarick and sundry inhabitants of Herkimer county, in the State of New York, praying that the said Barbarick may receive a support from the public, in consideration of four of his sons and three of his sons-in-law having enlisted as soldiers in the Army; which was ordered to be referred to a select committee.—Mr. MILLER, Mr. TAYLOR, and Mr. SKINNER, were appointed the said committee.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill to continue in force, for a limited time, certain acts, authorizing corps of rangers, and for the protection of the frontier of the United States, and making appropriations for the same; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

An engrossed bill to reward the officers and crew of the sloop of war Hornet was read the third time, and passed.

The House resumed the consideration of the resolution yesterday moved by Mr. KILBOURN, for appointing a committee to inquire into the expediency of providing for a more efficient and economical defence of the Northwestern frontier, by granting donations of land to actual settlers adjoining that frontier. The resolution having been amended, on motion of Mr. HEMPSTEAD, by the addition of Missouri to the other Territories, was agreed to—75 to 50.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

On motion of Mr. BIBB, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the several bills for laying direct and internal taxes; and, on his suggestion, the bill for assessing and laying a direct tax was first taken up. He explained the provisions of the bill, and expressed his regret at the necessity which had devolved this duty on him, viz; the indisposition of the chairman, (Mr. EPPES.)

Considerable discussion arose on amendments proposed to the details of the bill, respecting the arrangement of the districts, &c.

The Committee rose at the usual hour of adjournment, reported progress on the bill, and obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, June 23.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes;" in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act for the better regulation of the ordnance;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. TROUP, from the same committee, also reported a bill supplementary to the act in addition to the act, entitled "An act to raise an additional military force;" which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the several bills laying taxes.

The direct tax bill was further discussed and amended.

The question which excited most discussion was a proposition to strike out the apportionment of the direct taxes among the several counties in the States, as fixed by the bill, with a view to the appointment of assessors for the purpose of such apportionment in each State. The Committee rose without deciding on the proposition.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FISK of New York offered for consideration the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire whether John M. Bowers, returned as a member from the State of New York, is entitled to a seat in this House.

Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire whether Isaac Williams, jr., is not entitled to a seat in this House in the place of said John M. Bowers.

Mr. F. said he had before him, and would submit with the resolution, a certified copy of the return of votes given in at the late election in the 15th district of the State of New York, by which it appears that John M. Bowers and Isaac Williams, jr. were the two candidates. The whole number of votes given in was 8,917; of which there were for "Isaac Williams, jr." 4,129; for "Isaac Williams" 431; for "J. M. Bowers" 4,287 votes, and for "J. Bowers" seventy. By which statement it appears that if Isaac Williams, jr. had received the votes given to Isaac Williams, he would have had a majority of 203 votes over Mr. Bowers; even allowing to the latter the votes to have been given for him, in which a part of his name was omitted. The canvassers of votes have not judicial powers, and they gave a certificate that the highest number of votes was for such a name. In the State of New York, when a difficulty of this kind occurred, although the canvassers could not settle the question, the Legislature always settled it on investigation; because the mode of nominating candidates in New York left no doubt as to the identity of the person intended to be voted for. In several towns Mr. F. named, as many as 96, 135, 99, 91 votes had been given for Isaac Williams and none for Isaac Williams, jr. It could not be doubted that all these votes were intended for Isaac Williams, jr.

Mr. GROSVENOR expressed his surprise at this mode of bringing the election in question before the House. If the opposing candidate, knowing the facts, had not thought proper to come forward and contest the election, he was surprised that any one else should. Mr. G. wished the resolutions to lie on the table till to-morrow.

Mr. FISK said he never before had heard that the inability or neglect of any candidate to come forward and contest an election in which he was concerned, precluded any member of this House from doing it. Mr. F. had no particular objection to the resolutions lying on the table till to-morrow.

Mr. GROSVENOR said that he had always considered it the bounden duty of the Committee of Elections to inquire into the validity of the title of each member to a seat in the House; but he believed there was no example of this House entering of its own accord, without petition or remonstrance, into a scrutiny whether or not the sitting member had the greatest number of votes. He would not at this moment enter into a detail of the consequences which would certainly result from such a course as that proposed to be pursued.

Mr. PITKIN and Mr. HOPKINS opposed the resolve, on account of the novelty of the course, and Mr. NELSON took the opposite side.

Mr. FISK said that the novelty of the course was no argument against it. He had produced evidence to support the motion; and he did not see why it should not be allowed the same force as if presented by a petitioner.

The motion to lay the resolves on the table was negatived, 82 to 80.

Mr. GROSVENOR rose to propose an amendment. He said, by the laws of New York, it was required that the inspectors of the polls should not open the boxes until the close of the poll on the third day. He had seen an affidavit, that, at one of the elections in a Congressional district, the polls had been opened on the second day, giving a full opportunity for fraud, though he could not say that the opportunity had been seized by either party. The affidavits he would take upon himself to furnish to the Committee of Elections as the foundation of this motion. If this procedure should be illegal, it would affect the election of the gentleman returned from that district. He was unfriendly to the present mode of proceeding; but if commenced, it ought to extend to all cases. He, therefore, moved to insert in the first resolve, after "John M. Bowers," the names of John Leferts and Ebenezer Sage.

Some further conversation took place on this subject between Messrs. PITKIN, FISK, and GROSVENOR, as to the similarity of the two cases, &c.

Mr. PITKIN again moved to lay the resolution on the table; which was supported by Mr. GASTON and opposed by Mr. RHEA.

The motion prevailed, 78 to 77.

THURSDAY, June 24.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the tax bills.

The direct tax bill being still under consideration, considerable further discussion took place thereon; but the Committee rose without having gone through it, and had leave to sit again.

A motion was then made by Mr. PICKENS to discharge the Committee of the Whole from the further consideration of said bill, and recommit it to the Committee of Ways and Means, which motion was negatived.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FISK of New York called up the resolutions he yesterday submitted, directing the Committee of Elections to inquire into the title of Mr. BOWERS, of New York, to his seat in this House.

A motion was made to postpone the further consideration of this motion indefinitely.

On this motion a discussion took place, in which Messrs. GROSVENOR, SHIPHERD, BENSON, PITKIN, and GASTON advocated the postponement, and Messrs. FISK, ALSTON, and BURWELL opposed it.

The principal, nay, the only point really in controversy on this discussion was, whether it ought to be permitted to any member, on his own mere motion, to institute inquiries into the validity of the titles of other members to their seats. On the one hand, it was contended that such a course was contrary to all precedent; that it would prove vexatious to the sitting members, whose elections ought to be presumed unquestionable, until questioned by petition, on which foundation alone ought inquiry to be instituted; that a contrary course would open wide the door to imposition and fraud. On the other hand, it was contended that it was not only the right, but the duty of every member to inquire into and contest the validity of any election of which he has a cause to doubt; that the inability, apathy, or sickness of an unsuccessful candidate, ought not to be suffered to preclude inquiry into an election, on the face of which it was at least questionable whether or not it was legal. Mr. GASTON, who advocated the postponement, admitted the competency of any member, or of the House, to institute an inquiry in this case, but contended that it was inexpedient to resort to it, unless in extreme cases.

Some discussion also took place relative to the evidence and grounds on which the motion for inquiry was made, &c.; and other incidental remarks were made, not bearing on the decision of the principle in question.

The question of indefinite postponement was decided by yeas and nays. For the motion 65, against it 98, as follows:

A motion was made to lay the resolution on the table, and negatived.

The question was then taken on Mr. GROSVENOR'S motion, to incorporate the names of John Lefferts and Ebenezer Sage, and decided in the negative.—For the amendment 70, against it 84, as follows:

The question was then stated on the first resolution, as follows:

"Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire whether John M. Bowers, a sitting member from the State of New York, is entitled to a seat in this House."

Mr. BENSON then moved to amend the resolution by adding thereto, words to the following effect: "and, that the committee be instructed 'not to suffer any person to appear before them, 'as entitled to question said election, but Isaac Williams, junior, in person, or by his agent, duly constituted.'" This motion was negatived without a division.

The question on the adoption of the first resolution was then decided in the affirmative—ayes 91.

The question was then stated on the second resolution, in the following words:

"Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire whether Isaac Williams, junior, be not entitled to a seat in this House, instead of said John M. Bowers."

Mr. BRADLEY moved to amend the resolution so as to make the inquiry "whether any, and if any what, person is entitled to the seat now occupied by Mr. BOWERS."

This modification was adopted by Mr. FISK, as part of his motion.

Mr. GASTON opposed the passage of this resolution as unnecessary and irregular; as being too much like advertising for some person to claim the seat now occupied by Mr. BOWERS.

To this, Mr. ALSTON replied that the course was regular, and was the practice of every day in cases of contested elections.

The question on the passage of the second res-

FRIDAY, June 25.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the late and of the present army of the United States," in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

Mr. DAWSON reported a bill to improve the ground around the Capitol, in the city of Washington; twice read and committed.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the several tax bills. Further discussion took place on the details of the direct tax bill. The discussion to-day principally involved the question of the mode of apportioning the direct tax: whether, as proposed by the bill, the amount of direct tax to be paid by each county should be arbitrarily fixed, or whether the operation of the system should be delayed by a new valuation and assessment, which would apportion the taxes more equitably. An amendment going to change this feature of the bill was proposed, discussed, and negatived.

The Committee rose at the usual hour of adjournment, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, June 26.

Another member, to wit: from Kentucky, SAMUEL HOPKINS appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill, freeing from postage all letters and packets to and from the Superintendent General of Military Supplies; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

Mr. McKIM, after stating two cases of severe wounds, by the bursting of a cannon on board a private armed vessel, for which cases the existing law provided no relief by pensions, as the wounds were not received in actual conflict with the enemy, moved the following resolution; which was adopted:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what amendments are necessary to the act regulating pensions to persons on board private armed vessels.

The bill from the Senate, "for the relief of infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the late and of the present army of the United States," was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HUMPHREYS offered for consideration the following resolution, the object of which he explained by appropriate remarks; and also stated that it was founded on a resolution of the Legislature of Tennessee, instructing its Senators and Representatives on this head:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what provision is necessary to be made to enable the claimants of land within the Congressional reservation, and to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, within the limits of the State of Tennessee, to re-mark the lines and perpetuate testimony as to the boundaries of their respective tracts; and that they report by bill or otherwise.

NAVY ON THE UPPER LAKES.

Mr. WILSON rose to offer a resolution on the subject of our naval establishment on the Upper Lakes, introductory to which he submitted a few explanatory remarks. He believed it to be usual and proper to originate in one of the Houses of Congress, whatever relates to the establishment, augmentation, preservation, or reduction of the navy. That branch of it, said he, which is destined exclusively for the interior waters, being but recently commenced and still incomplete, would naturally seem to claim peculiar attention. In the operations of a war upon a line of the enemy, extending from Quebec to Chicago, more than fifteen hundred miles, by waters navigable from his great naval and military seaport, and extending to the rendezvous of another enemy still more formidable while possessed of such ample means of protection, support, and supply, the indispensable importance to us of a naval force is evident, and accordingly has been duly appreciated by all branches of this Government. A large sum has been appropriated by the Legislature, and great energy has been exerted under the direction of the Executive to establish such a force. Whatever imperfections may have appeared in the plan or execution, I am persuaded are purely such as are common to all experiments.

One thing Mr. W. deemed essentially necessary now to be provided; that was a dock-yard, or a secure and convenient harbor for the Winter season. Such a harbor, said he, is highly necessary during the Summer season, and would, I believe, nearly double the effect and usefulness of the public shipping; but, waiving any remarks on this point at present, I do believe that, for the stormy months in the Autumn, for the preservation of the vessels through the Winter, and, above all, to insure their seasonable operation the next Spring, it is indispensably necessary to select a harbor on the south shore of Lake Erie; and as the harbor of Presque Isle is spacious and secure, and situated immediately upon the most direct and commodious, if not the only practicable route of the necessary communication with the extensive naval, military, and provision stores, which may be produced and collected at Pittsburg, I have little doubt but that this, amongst all the harbors on the south shore, will for the present be found most, if not the only one suitable. If I am correct in this, and I have no doubt of it, sir, it will then become indispensably necessary to cut a ship channel through the sand bar which now impedes the entrance of this basin. For such an object there is no existing provision by law, and if it is not commenced seasonably, however necessary it may be found, it cannot be done this season. Mr. W., after some further remarks, submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Naval Establishment be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what further provision, by law, is necessary for completing, securing against storms or enemies, or for giving full effect to the naval force of the United States on the Upper Lakes, whether by establishing a dock-yard, selecting, and, if necessary, improving a convenient and safe winter harbor, or by any other measure, and to report thereon to this House.

The resolution was agreed to.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties; and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported, with several amendments; which were again read, and, except one in the thirty-first section, concurred in by the House; which said amendment in the thirty-first section was disagreed to by the House.

The bill was then further amended at the Clerk's table; when a motion was made by Mr. MONTGOMERY to strike out the fifteenth section of the said bill, as follows:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That immediately after hearing appeals, the principal assessors respectively shall make out lists containing the sums payable according to the assessments aforesaid, and according to the provisions of this act, upon every object of taxation within their respective districts, so as to raise upon each county or State district contained within the collection districts established by this act, for which they are respectively appointed, the quota of the direct tax laid by the United States, which shall have been imposed on such county or State district by the law laying such direct tax; which lists shall contain the name of each person residing within the collection district liable to pay the direct tax, or of the person residing within the said district, and having the care or superintendence of property lying within the said district, which is liable to the payment of said tax, where such person or persons are known, together with the sum payable by each person or persons aforesaid, on account of the said direct tax as aforesaid. And where there is any property within any collection district liable to the payment of the direct tax, not owned or occupied by, or under, the superintendence of any person resident therein, there shall be a separate list of such property, the sums payable, and the names of the respective proprietors, where known.

And in lieu thereof to insert the following new sections:

SEC. 15. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by —, in each State, Territory, and district, an officer, to be styled the Supervisor of the Revenue, who, previous to his entering upon the duties enjoined him by this act, shall execute bond to the United States, in the penalty of —, with one or more sureties, to be approved of by the Secretary of the Treasury, conditioned for the faithful discharge of the duties of his office as specified in this act, and shall take an oath, before some officer legally authorized to administer the same, that he will faithfully and impartially execute the duties of his office; and shall forthwith transmit to the Secretary of the Treasury, a certificate of such oath, to be by him preserved.

SEC. 16. And be it further enacted, That the several principal assessors, appointed under the authority of this act, shall, within ten days after the expiration of the time allowed for taking appeals, and correcting the assessments contemplated, by actual calculation, ascertain the amount of the value of property assessed for taxation in each county in his collection district, and shall make out, sign, and record, a fair certificate thereof, in which he shall specify, distinctly, the amount as aforesaid in each county.

SEC. 17. And be it further enacted, That the Supervisor of the Revenue shall, within thirty days after the time allowed the principal assessors to ascertain the amount of property assessed for taxation in each city or county, demand and receive, from the said principal assessors, respectively, a certificate of the amount of the value of property assessed for taxation in each county; and shall, within ten days thereafter, ascertain, by the principles of direct proportion, the quota of each county of any direct tax imposed by any law of the United States; and shall also ascertain what per centum on the amount of the property assessed in each county will give the quota of the county; and having ascertained the quota of each county, and the per centum necessary to make such quota, it shall be his duty, within the time aforesaid, to make out, sign, and record, a fair certificate of the quota of each county in every collection district, and the per centum necessary to make such quota, making as many certificates as there are collection districts in his State, Territory, or district; one copy of which certificate, in due form certified, shall, within twenty days, be transmitted to the principal assessors, respectively, and another within thirty days, by the post, to the Commissioner of the Revenue, in Washington City.

SEC. 18. And be it further enacted, That the principal assessor in each collection district, within thirty days after the receipt of the certificate of the Supervisor of the Revenue, as to the amount of property assessed and the per centum necessary to make the same in each county, shall make out a fair list of the persons in each county liable to the payment of taxes, the species of property assessed to them respectively, at the end of which he shall add a certificate of the quota of the county and the per centum necessary to make such a quota, and, within the time aforesaid, deliver, to the collector of his collection district, the said list and certificate, taking from the collector a receipt specifying the total amount of taxes to be collected, the quota of each county, the amount of property assessed in the county, and the per centum thereon necessary to give the quota; a copy of which receipt he shall forthwith transmit, by post, to the Commissioner of the Revenue, at Washington; and which copy, the original, or any copy thereof, shall be complete evidence in any suit or action against the collector of the revenue or his deputy.

SEC. 19. And be it further enacted, That the principal collector, by himself or his deputies, shall, within — days after the receipt of the list of persons and property subject to taxation as hereinbefore directed, collect from each person subject to taxation, the sum due from such person, according to the per centum certified to be necessary to make the quota of the county, by the supervisor of the revenue, and shall, upon payment, in all cases where it may be done, execute to the person so paying, a receipt therefor, specifying the sum paid, the species of property paid for, and the per centum collected thereon.

SEC. 20. And be it further enacted, That the principal assessor in each collection district shall keep a durable record book, in which he shall enter all transfers of property assessed for taxation, under the authority of any law of the United States, specifying the species and value of such property, from whom and to whom transferred; and the said assessors shall attend each of the court-houses in their respective districts on some court day in the months of October, November, or December, with the book aforesaid, for the purpose of entering transfers as aforesaid, having given two months' notice of the time of attendance in some newspaper of the State, Territory, or district, within which he resides; and the said assessors, respectively, shall, annually, on the fifteenth day of January, transmit to the principal collector of his district, a certified list of such transferred property, and the said certified list of property transferred shall govern the collector and his deputies, in the same manner as the original list furnished by the assessor, exempting the vender and charging the vendee; and the said assessors, for entering such transfer of taxable property, and all services incident thereto, may, in each case, demand and receive the sum of — cents, to be paid by the person to whom the property is transferred.

On this motion, Mr. MONTGOMERY addressed the House nearly as follows:

Mr. Chairman: Before I enter into a comparison of the amendment proposed with the original, I deem it proper to remark that I design to bring into view not only the bill now under consideration, but also the bill for laying a direct tax on the people of the United States. I believe this will be correct, as the whole has generally been considered and spoken of as one entire system, and as the bearing of the amendment will thereby be the better understood.

13th CON. 1st SESS.—11

Sir, I am as deeply impressed with the necessity of adopting some system of internal taxation as any member of this House; I believe the fate of this nation rests upon it; without it public credit will sink, and the energies of the nation be paralyzed and disordered. But, sir, with the necessity, I am strongly impressed with the importance of so modifying the system as that it may operate justly upon the different portions of the States respectively; that it may not be in the power of whole counties or sections of a State to say in truth, that we are unjustly burdened in comparison with our fellow-citizens. Under these impressions, and with the most firm belief that the bill under consideration, taken in connexion with the bill laying a direct tax on the United States, as they now stand, will operate unjustly on many portions of our common country unless the amendment which I have proposed, or one similar thereto, is adopted—I say, sir, the injustice will be gross and flagrant, throwing on particular counties and sections of the country a much larger portion of the public burdens than, according to the principles of justice, they ought to bear.

That the people ought to contribute in a just proportion to their wealth, for the support of the Government, according to the specie standard, is a proposition having on my mind something like the force of a mathematical axiom; it is most certainly true in theory, but I will admit that precise and exact justice is not to be attained in reference to the subject of taxation: but this admission will not go to prove, that because we cannot come at complete and exact justice under a correct principle of taxation, that we ought to abandon all just theory and resort to principles in themselves unjust and absurd. As well might it be contended that because inaccuracies will arise in the admeasurement of land under those mathematical principles applicable to the art of surveying, from the unevenness of ground, mistakes of chainmen, and the wrong use of instruments, that we ought to abandon the art, although perfectly true in theory and producing nearly a just result, and resort to guessing.

Let us now test the bill under consideration with the bill laying a direct tax and apportioning the same among the several States and counties, by the principle which I have stated. The direct tax bill not only assigns to each State its quota, but it goes on to assign to the several counties in each State respectively their quota or portion of the State's quota. In doing this the Committee of Ways and Means have proceeded upon two district principles; the one the principle of taxation according to certain of the State revenue laws, applicable to States where revenue is paid into the State Treasury for State purposes, taking the amount so paid by each county as the data of the present apportionment, and making the quota of each county bear the same proportion to the State's quota of the direct tax as the tax of such county bears to the whole revenue of the State; the other, a principle drawn from a comparison of the valuations of the year

H. OF R.

The Ways and Means.

JUNE, 1813.

1799 with the census of the year 1800, and the census of the year 1810, taking the numbers of each county as the data of the apportionment, and taking it as true that population and wealth since the year 1799 has increased in the same ratio. The first of these principles has been applied to Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Jersey, Virginia, North Carolina, South Carolina, Ohio, and Kentucky. The second has been applied to New Hampshire, Rhode Island, Vermont, New York, Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland.

I do not pretend to an intimate acquaintance with the revenue laws of all the States to which the first principle has been applied; but I have by inquiry obtained such information respecting several of them as has convinced me that they are unjust; that the main principle of them is taxation by quantity and numbers, without regard to the specie value. In the State of Kentucky the revenue law divides the lands for taxation into three rates, first, second, and third, according to the fertility of the soil of the greater part of each tract; and each hundred acres of the same rate pays the same amount of tax, be the specie value what it may; no regard is had to the increased value arising from contiguity to commercial towns, highways, or navigable waters. It is a truth, in relation to that State, that lands in some sections bear to others the proportion of three to one in specie value, and yet the same tax is paid under the State revenue law. The revenue law of that State is obviously unjust, and as the apportionment of the direct tax among the several counties is bottomed on that law as data, or the criterion of apportionment, it must be also unjust. The principle as applied to Virginia, I believe, is at least as exceptionable: according to the revenue laws of that State, some twenty or thirty years past, the lands were divided into four classes; the lands bounding on the tide waters were placed in this first class and made to pay the highest taxes; the region adjacent in the second class, extending to the Blue Ridge; the third class between the Blue Ridge and the Alleghany; and the fourth beyond the Alleghany, and the tax made to decrease in an arbitrary proportion as the class receded from the first. To my mind this system of taxation is grossly unjust: first, because it regards not the enhanced value arising from convenience to great leading roads, navigable rivers, and fertility of soil; and secondly, because it regards not the changes in specie value produced by the progress of population and cultivation. The Virginia system is unjust in itself, and the apportionment among the several counties of that State dependent upon it must be unjust. But if the apportionment among the counties of Kentucky and Virginia, dependent upon the revenue laws of those States, are exceptionable for their injustice—in those States where something has been done for the purpose of advancing towards the specie value—what shall we say of North Carolina and Tennessee? In the States last mentioned, according to the revenue laws every hundred acres of land pays the same tax; it is perfectly taxation according to quantity without regard to value; and I believe I may venture to assert, that in the State of Tennessee counties may be selected the lands of which, upon an average valuation, compared with others upon the like valuation, would bear the proportion of five to one. In North Carolina I know not that the disproportion is so extremely great, but have no doubt from the nature of things that it must be great. An apportionment bottomed upon the revenue laws of the States last mentioned, must strike every person as being monstrously unjust. With respect to the other States to which the principle under consideration has been applied, I will say nothing, but have no doubt it will operate unjustly. There is one consideration in relation to this principle which ought not to escape notice, it is that the injustice of the apportionment depending upon the injustice of the State revenue laws is increased in the proportion that the State's quota is greater than the revenue raised under the State laws, which in some of the States is nearly as three to one.

With respect to those States where the principle of apportionment has been drawn from a comparison of the assessments of 1799, with the population of 1800 and 1810, in which it is assumed as true that population and wealth, since the year 1800, have increased in the same ratio, I will say but little, not being intimately acquainted with the internal situation of those States to which it has been applied; but I cannot refrain from remarking that I view it as a very fallacious standard. How often does it happen in the settling of new counties that there is a great and sudden increase of population in particular districts, by emigrations from others, without a correspondent increase of wealth? This, I believe, may have very probably happened in the frontier parts of New York and Pennsylvania in the time between 1800 and 1810. I know such an increase has taken place in Kentucky as would have rendered it monstrously, cruelly unjust, to have applied the principle to many of the counties there. I cannot hesitate to conclude, that in many of the States the principle will operate unjustly; it is in truth but guessing at the sum to be raised on each county, for no man can know that it is anything like a correct standard.

Sir, the want of uniformity in the principle by which the apportionments have been made, is to my mind of itself a ground of objection to the system in its present form; it is certainly desirable that a single principle which would probably produce a just result in its operation upon our wide extended country should be applied; we could not then be charged with partiality or a disregard to the interests of any portion. Local dissensions would be prevented.

Another objection to the system in its present form is the repugnance of the parts. The bill for the assessment and collection of direct taxes, contains in express terms the principle, that all direct taxes shall be assessed upon the value of lands, houses, lots of ground with their improvements, and slaves—the very principle I have contended for; and the bill laying a direct tax makes an arbitrary and unjust apportionment among the several counties in each State, without regard to the value of the property upon which it is laid.

The Ways and Means.

H. OF R.

Having offered my remarks to show the injustice, want of uniformity, and repugnance of the system in its present form, I will proceed to show the effect of the amendment which I have proposed.

The amendment proposes to proceed upon the principle of taxation according to the specie value, and defers the apportionment among the respective counties in each State until the valuations are made; it provides for the appointment of an officer, whose duty it shall be to collect all the valuations in his State, and ascertain, as a mere matter of arithmetical calculation, the quota of the several counties, and the per centum necessary to be collected to make such quota; it contains several other provisions deemed by me necessary to carry the main principle into complete operation; and provides for cases of transferred property. I will not say that exact justice will in all cases be done; I believe that some injustice may be done by the frauds of assessors, but not to be drawn into comparison with the monstrous injustice of the present apportionments. The amendment in its main principle I know to be theoretically just, and that it harmonizes with an important principle of the bill already stated, and which has formed the basis of my reasoning: the details I am not anxious about; gentlemen may change them, probably for better.

That objections may be stated against the amendment which I have proposed, I have no doubt; I have heard some, but will not now anticipate and meet them. If the amendment proposed is adopted, the fifteenth and sixteenth sections of the bill for the assessment and collection of direct taxes will be stricken out, and also all the sections of the bill laying a direct tax, which apportions the same among the several counties in each State.

Mr. MONTGOMERY subsequently spoke in reply to observations of other gentlemen, nearly as follows:

Mr. Chairman—When I opened the discussion on the amendment under consideration I endeavored, by all the arguments which presented themselves to my mind, to evince the injustice of the system of taxation, so far as regards the apportionment of the direct tax: in this I have been much aided by several gentlemen from Virginia, who have, by reference to several counties, shown the injustice of its operation; and by a gentleman from New Hampshire, showing that a single county in that State will, according to the apportionment, pay seven thousand dollars or thereabouts more than its just portion; and by a gentleman from New York, who has shown that the city and county of New York will pay from seventy to eighty thousand dollars more than its just proportion of the State's quota.

Still further to expose the injustice and absurdity of the system, I will examine the subject in reference to the valuation of houses in Kentucky and some of the other States. In the States of Kentucky, Ohio, Tennessee, North Carolina, and, in short, I believe in nearly the whole of the States, houses are not taxed under the revenue law; in the system which we propose to adopt houses are to be valued and taxed. The just operation of the tax upon houses would be the lessening the tax upon all other subjects of taxation throughout the State, in the proportion which the value of the houses bore to the value of all the other subjects of taxation; but this is not its effect under the present apportionment; the value of the houses extends not beyond the limits of the county in which they stand. The consequence of this is, that landholders in different counties, of the same fertility, will pay sums different in amount, on account of the higher state of improvement in some counties than others; and it will be in almost every instance land of less specie value paying a higher tax than land of greater value. Is this just, is it politic? I think it certainly is not. Was it for this purpose that States have been subdivided into counties? I take it that it was not. I have supposed that it was for the convenience of the administration of justice, &c., and not that by encircling the richest lands and the most valuable improvements within the line of a county, the value of those lands and improvements were to be lost to a certain degree in the estimation of taxation.

I will now proceed to reply to the most prominent arguments advanced against the amendment which I have proposed, and in support of the bills in their present condition. It is objected to the amendment, that the assessors, with a view to favor their own districts, will undervalue the property, and thereby lessen the amount of taxes. To this I answer, first, that it is not to be presumed, because they will act under the sanction of an oath; secondly, their own individual interest will be so inconsiderable as to afford no temptation; thirdly, that it is as probable that one will do it as another, and if the whole will do so, the general result may be the same as though they had valued honestly; fourthly, this is an evil which may perchance happen, but according to the present apportionments the injustice must happen; fifthly, if this injustice should happen in some small degree, under principles just in themselves, it is what ever has happened from the folly or fraud of ministerial officers; it may be ascribed to the imperfections of human nature, and we cannot be held responsible for it; but if the gross injustice is produced which must result from the present apportionments, we alone are responsible; and it may be an awful responsibility.

It has been objected, that the amendments will increase the expense of the system. I admit that it may eventuate in a small additional expense, perhaps four or five thousand dollars in the United States; but can this be opposed to the gross injustice of the apportionments, by which single counties will pay thousands more than their just portions of the tax? Is a little expense to be saved by doing the most flagrant injustice?

Away with it—it is absurd to speak of the difference in the expense.

It has been very emphatically objected, that a new officer is to be created with vast powers. Those who have urged this, certainly do not understand the amendments; for, by looking into it, it will be seen that those vast powers consist of the power and duty of riding to the principal assessors to collect their certificates of the valuation in the respective counties; to ascertain the quotas of the counties by the principles of arithmetic; and to certify the same to the assessors. Vast, immense powers!

It has been objected to the amendment, that it would procrastinate the collection of the revenue. It is true that if the bill contained no section for postponement, that the plan of the amendment would require about twenty days longer to carry it into operation; but certainly this delay ought not to urge us into an unjust apportionment. But if my amendment is adopted, and a majority of the committee take the same view of the subject which I consider as politic, the part containing the principle of postponement will be stricken out. Gentlemen talk strangely indeed, when they speak of the importance of expedition, and are at the same time in favor of postponing the operation of the revenue laws for five or six months without any reason.

But there is a cure for all the injustice of the apportionments, say gentlemen, in the power vested in the State Legislatures to alter the same. To this I answer, first, that I cannot see the correctness of doing injustice and trusting to others to correct it; it is very uncertain whether the State Legislatures will interfere—it is, in a word, leaving the matter to chance. In the second place, I doubt the constitutionality of transferring this subject to the State Legislatures, and will find considerable difficulty in voting for the bill until it is stripped of this provision. It is a matter of importance with me to get clear of it.

It has been said that we ought to adopt the present plan as a temporary one, that the valuations under it will be just, and that upon them we can build a most perfect system, upon them we can make a just apportionment. How strangely, how inconsistently gentlemen argue! when speaking of the valuations as they relate to the amendment, they are to be unjust and made so with a view to lessen the quota of particular counties; but when it is necessary to find an apology for present injustice, the valuations are to be just. In the same breath it blows hot and cold.

I have now examined all the objections urged against the amendment, and can find nothing in them to change my opinion; they are such as are always at hand, and will lie to any system however perfect; and indeed the main principle of the amendment is exactly correct in theory, but subject like all other principles correct in themselves to be in some measure perverted by the imperfections of human nature; the bills under consideration are imperfect in themselves and liable in some degree to be rendered still more so by the imperfections of human nature. I have proposed to substitute a just plan for one which will produce gross injustice. I have proposed to substitute a plan operating uniformly and consistently for one which is directly the reverse. I have proposed it under the most thorough sense of duty, and not from a disposition to be captious; if it succeeds it will give me pleasure, because I can then vote for the bills with pleasure, and can with ease justify my votes; if it does not, I assure gentlemen I will vote for the bills reluctantly, and will find it difficult to justify my votes. I will, however, as I now expect, vote for them, believing as I do that partial injustice will not be so great an evil as the loss of public credit at this eventful crisis of our national affairs.

Another member, to wit: from New York, ABRAHAM HASBROUCK, appeared, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. CRAWFORD presented a petition of James Lloyd, setting forth that he has discovered "a combustible liquid substance, applicable to the purposes of national defence or offence, whether naval or military," and praying the aid and patronage of the Government in carrying his discovery into full effect; which was read, and referred to a select committee. Messrs. CRAWFORD, SEYBERT, and HOPKINS of Kentucky, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. HOPKINS, of New York, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire and report whether it will be proper so to amend the articles of war as to allow to all persons on trial before any courts martial, for any capital offence, the right of having counsel to conduct their defence.

An engrossed bill freeing from postage all letters and packets to and from the Superintendent General of Military Supplies, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to authorize the raising a corps of sea-fencibles;" also, a bill "to amend the act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to raise an additional military force, and for other purposes,'" also, a bill "for the relief of Alexander Scott;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

The first mentioned bill from the Senate was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The second mentioned bill from the Senate was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The last mentioned bill from the Senate was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate "to amend the act, entitled 'An act to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions, and to repeal the act now in force for those purposes," with amendments; which were read, and, with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The House then resolved into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States; and after some time, the Committee rose, reported progress in the bill, and obtained leave to sit again.

Mr. FISK, of New York, offered the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to prepare and report to this House a bill on the imposing and collecting of a duty not exceeding — per gallon on all spirits distilled within the United States.

The resolution was referred to a Committee of the Whole; and the House resolved itself into a Committee on said resolve, but before any decision was had thereon, the Committee rose, and reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was recommended the report on the contested election between John P. Hungerford and John Taliaferro, made a supplemental report; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The report is as follows:

That, from the polls of the several counties, the sitting member appears to have obtained a majority of twenty-four votes in the district.

The petitioner claims the seat on the ground that a majority of the legal votes at said election were given for him; and, as evidence to support his claim, produced the land list of 1812, with a copy of the poll taken in each county in the district of said election. that, on comparing the polls of each county with the aforesaid land list, and taking that as the test, it appears that 193 persons who voted for the petitioner, and 234 persons who voted for the sitting member, were not qualified to vote: that, deducting from both polls the persons challenged, who do not appear to have been qualified to vote according to the land list aforesaid, there is left for Mr. Taliaferro a majority of seventeen votes over Mr. Hungerford. The petitioner contends that the difficulties of ascertaining the names, places of abode, and property, of the voters, presented by the omission of duly entering their names on the poll book, forbid the hope of a fair and successful scrutiny of the poll by means of any other evidence than that of comparing it with the land list, on which alone ought the merits of his claim, and the right of the sitting member to his seat, to rest. But the committee were of opinion that it was competent for the parties to support their challenges and polls by other evidence, and therefore admitted the accompanying affidavits, with the testimony of Henry Lee, junior, Daniel C. Brent, and John Cook, (the two latter gentlemen produced by the petitioner,) as sufficient to support forty-three of the votes on his poll, that were challenged by the petitioner, and not found on the land list aforesaid. And the petitioner, by the testimony of the said Lee, Brent, and Cook, proved the legality of fifteen votes found on his poll, challenged by the sitting member, and not found on the land list. That, by adding the aforesaid forty-three votes to the poll of Mr. Hungerford, and the said fifteen votes to the poll of Mr. Taliaferro, there is left for the former gentleman a majority of eleven votes over the latter.

The petitioner contends that the evidence exhibited by the affidavits fell far short of supporting the votes it was intended for, because it did not show that the voters had the possession of the freehold title to their lands, as well as of the land itself, in right of which they voted, six months prior to the day of said election, and which, as he alleged, the laws of Virginia required to entitle them to vote, except in cases where they came into possession of the land by marriage, descent, or devise. If this construction of the law, which the strict letter of it seems to warrant, had been adopted by the committee, it would have left fourteen of the aforesaid forty-three votes, given for Mr. Hungerford, unsupported, and to the petitioner a majority of four votes; but, from the best information the committee could obtain of the construction given this law, by the usage of the Virginia Legislature, a majority were inclined to the opinion that the spirit and intention of the law were satisfied when the voter had been six months in the actual possession of the land, and obtained his freehold title to the same any time previous to his voting.

From the above statement of facts, the committee are of opinion that the petitioner has not supported his petition.

Ordered, That Mr. TALIAFERRO have leave to occupy a seat on the floor of the House during the discussion on the above-mentioned report.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties.

The question depending at the time of adjournment on Saturday last, on the motion of Mr. MONTGOMERY, to strike out the fifteenth section of the said bill, and to insert three new sections, was stated; and, being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 60, nays 101, as follows:

The bill was then further amended, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Wednesday.

TUESDAY, June 29.

Mr. MOORE presented a petition of Thomas H. Roberts, stating that he has invented a machine that may be applied with great effect in maritime warfare, and, particularly, in the defence of ports, rivers, and harbors, and praying that the merits of his invention may be investigated by Congress.—Referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee of Claims, reported the bill from the Senate "for the relief of Alexander Scott," without amendment, and it was committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

Mr. ARCHER, from the same committee, reported a bill concerning invalid pensioners; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. ARCHER, from the same committee, reported a bill for the relief of Edwin T. Satterwhite; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

On motion of Mr. ARCHER, the Committee of Claims were discharged from the further consideration of all other business now before them, and not reported on, for the reason that it would be utterly impracticable to act on the said business at the present session. This order was unsuccessfully opposed by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, who proposed to except from the general discharge the case of Henry Harris, but failed.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from a select committee, appointed on the first instant, reported a bill to establish a district court in the Mississippi Territory; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate "to amend the act in addition to the act, entitled 'An act to raise an additional military force, and for other purposes,' without amendment; and the bill was committed to the Committee of the Whole to whom was referred the bill supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act to raise an additional military force.'"

Remonstrance of Massachusetts.

H. OF R.

Mr. TROUP, from the same committee, also reported the bill from the Senate "to authorize the raising a corps of sea fencibles," without amendment; and the bill was committed to the Committee last mentioned.

REMONSTRANCE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. PICKERING presented the Memorial or Remonstrance of the Legislature of Massachusetts against the war; which he read in his place, as follows:

To the Honorable the Senate and the Honorable the House of Representatives of the United States, in Congress assembled:

The Legislature of Massachusetts, deeply impressed with the sufferings of their constituents, and excited by the apprehension of still greater evils in prospect, feel impelled, by a solemn sense of duty, to lay before the National Government their view of the public interests, and to express with the plainness of freemen, the sentiments of the people of this ancient and extensive Commonwealth.

Although the precise limits of the powers reserved to the several State Sovereignities have not been defined by the Constitution, yet we fully coincide in the correctness of the opinions advanced by our venerable Chief Magistrate, that "our constitutions insure to us the freedom of speech, and that, at this momentous period, it is our right and duty to inquire into the grounds and origin of the present war, to reflect on the state of public affairs, and to express our sentiments concerning them, with decency and frankness, and to endeavor, as far as our limited influence extends, to promote, by temperate and Constitutional means, an honorable reconciliation."

If, then, such are the rights and duties of the people, surely those who, at this solemn crisis, are selected by them, and who are specially honored with their confidence, may venture respectfully but frankly to express the sentiments and feelings of those whom they have the honor to represent.

The States, as well as the individuals composing them, are parties to the national compact; and it is their peculiar duty, especially in times of peril, to watch over the rights and guard the privileges solemnly guaranteed by that instrument. Certainly then this expression from the Legislature of the free and independent Commonwealth of Massachusetts, will not be disregarded by the present Congress of the United States. For although the numerous petitions and remonstrances of the people of this State, in relation to such measures as they deemed dangerous to their rights and ruinous to their interests, have heretofore been received in a manner little calculated to produce that harmony and to cement that union, which ought to be the permanent aim of the General Government, yet we cannot but indulge the hope that new councils and a more conciliatory spirit will distinguish the several branches of the present National Legislature; that they will endeavor, by the exercise of justice and impartiality, to allay the apprehensions and restore the confidence of the eastern and commercial States; to remove their actual sufferings, and to replace them in the happy and prosperous condition from which they have been driven by a succession of measures, hostile to the rights of commerce, and destructive to the peace of the Union.

It is not to be expected, that a hardy and industrious people, instructed in the nature of their rights and tenacious of their exercise, whose enterprise was a source of individual wealth and national prosperity, should find themselves obliged to abandon their accustomed employments, and relinquish the means of subsistence, without complaint; or that a moral and Christian people should contribute their aid in the prosecution of an offensive war without the fullest evidence of its justice and necessity.

The United States, from the form of their Government, from the principles of their institutions, from the sacred professions which in all periods of their history they have made, from the maxims transmitted to them by patriots and sages, whose loss they can never sufficiently deplore, as well as from a regard to their best and dearest interests, ought to be the last nation to engage in a war of ambition or conquest.

The recent establishment of their institutions, the pacific, moral, and industrious character of their citizens, the certainty that time and prudent application of their resources would bring a seasonable remedy for any transient wrongs, would have induced a wise and provident, an impartial and temperate Administration, to overlook, if it had been necessary, any temporary evils, which either the ambition, the interest, the cupidity, or the injustice of foreign Powers might occasionally, and without any deep and lasting injury, have inflicted.

With these maxims and these views, we cannot discern anything in the policy of foreign nations towards us, which in point of expediency required the sacrifice of so many and so certain blessings as might have been our portion, for such dreadful and inevitable evils as all wars, especially in a Republic, entail upon the people.

But when we review the alleged causes of the war against Great Britain, and more particularly the pretences for its continuance, after the principal one was removed, we are constrained to say that it fills the minds of the good people of this Commonwealth with infinite anxiety and alarm. We cannot but recollect, whatever the pretences of the Emperor of France may have been, pretences which have uniformly preceded and accompanied the most violent acts of injustice, that he was the sole author of a system calculated and intended to break down neutral commerce, with a view to destroy the opulence and cripple the power of a rival whose real policy was to uphold that commerce, so essential to her own prosperity.

It is not for us to decide, whether the enemy of France did or did not adopt the most natural and efficacious means of repelling her injustice. It is sufficient that we are persuaded the United States might, by a firm and dignified yet pacific resistance to the French decrees, have prevented the recurrence of any retaliatory measures on the part of Great Britain; measures not intended to injure us, but to operate on the author of this unjust and iniquitous system. And however honorable men may differ as to the justice of the British retaliatory Orders in Council, we do not hesitate to say that France merited from our Government a much higher tone of remonstrance and a more decided opposition.

In reviewing the avowed causes of the present war, we would if it were possible pass over a series of transactions imperfectly explained and calculated to excite our alarm and regret at the hasty manner in which it was declared. But the history of the pretended repeal of the French decrees, which if our Government was sincere we are bound to believe was the immediate cause of the war, is so well attested, and has been so often discussed, and is besides so important in this inquiry, that mere motives of delicacy cannot induce us to pass it over without notice.

If war could be justified against Great Britain exclusively, it must have been on the ground assumed by our Government, that the French decrees were actually repealed on the first of November, 1810. The indiscriminate plunder and destruction of our commerce; the capture of our ships by the cruisers of France, and their condemnation by her courts, and by the Emperor in person; his repeated and solemn declaration that those decrees were still in force, and constituted the fundamental laws of his Empire, at a period long subsequent to the pretended repeal; seemed to furnish answer sufficiently conclusive to this question; and we cannot but lament that evidence so satisfactory to the rest of the nation should have had so little weight with that Congress whose term of service has lately expired.

But this important question is now definitively answered; and the American people have learned, with astonishment, the depth of their degradation. The French Emperor, as if for the perfect and absolute humiliation of our Government, and for the annunciation to the world that he held us in utter contempt, reserved till May, 1812, the official declaration of the fact, that these decrees were not repealed until April, 1811; and then, not in consequence of his sense of their injustice, but because we had complied with the condition he had prescribed in the letter of the Duke of Cadore, in causing "our rights to be respected," by a resistance to the British orders; and he has since added, that this decree of repeal was communicated to our Minister at Paris, as well as to his own at Washington, to be made known to our Cabinet. As the previous pledge of Great Britain gave the fullest assurance, that she would repeal her orders as soon as the decrees on which they were founded should cease to exist; and as her subsequent conduct leaves no doubt that she would have been faithful to her promise, we can never too much deplore the neglect to make known this repeal, whether it be attributable to the French Government or our own.

If to the former belong the guilt of this duplicity and falsehood, every motive of interest, and every incitement of duty, call loudly upon our Administration to proclaim this disgraceful imposition to the American people; not only as it would serve to develop the true character and policy of France, but to acquit our own officers of a suppression too serious to be overlooked or forgiven.

But whatever may be the true state of this mysterious transaction, the promptness with which Great Britain hastened to repeal her orders, before the declaration of war by the United States was known to her, and the restoration of an immense amount of property, then within her power, can leave but little doubt that the war, on our part, was premature; and still less, that the perseverance in it after that repeal was known was improper, impolitic, and unjust.

It was improper; because it manifested, in this particular instance, a distrust in good faith and disposition to peace, of a nation, from which we had just received a signal proof of both.

It was impolitic; because it gave countenance to the charge of a subserviency to the views of France, and of an ulterior design of co-operating with her, in the profligate and enormous project of subjugating the rest of Europe.

It was impolitic; as it intended to unite all descriptions of people, in England, in favor of the present war, and to convince them, however erroneously, that moderation and fairness on her part, only laid the foundation of new claims and higher pretensions, on ours.

It was unjust; because the evidence afforded by the prompt repeal of the Orders in Council, ought to have satisfied us that Great Britain was sincerely disposed to maintain and preserve pacific relations with the United States; and all wars are unjust, the objects of which can be attained by negotiation.

It was unjust; because the whole history of our diplomatic intercourse with Great Britain shows, that we never induced her to believe, that we considered the impressment of her own seamen, on board our merchant ships, as reasonable ground of war; and we had never offered her the alternative of war, or a relinquishment of the practice.

It was unjust; because the pretensions and claims, on the one side and the other, although attended with difficulties, were not irreconcilable. Great Britain did not claim the right to impress our native seamen. She disavowed the practice, in all cases, when the fact was made known to her—she restored on legal evidence—she had recently offered to return all who were of that description, of whom a list should be furnished by our Government; and she had, many years before, made such offers of fair and amicable arrangement of this whole subject, as, to two distinguished members of our present Cabinet, appeared "both honorable and advantageous."

It was unjust; because we had not previously taken all the reasonable steps, on our part, to remove her complaints of the seduction and employment of her seamen. This is made manifest, by the conduct of the same Congress which declared the war, they having admitted the propriety of obviating those complaints, by an act passed subsequent to the commencement of hostilities.

No State in the Union can have a greater interest, or feel a stronger desire to protect commerce, and maintain the legitimate rights of seamen, than this Commonwealth. Owners of one-third of all the navigation, and probably furnishing nearly one-half of all the native seamen of the United States, we are better enabled to appreciate the extent of the sufferings, and must also be presumed to sympathize with them, more sincerely than the citizens of States destitute of commerce, and whose sons are not engaged in its prosecution; unless it be admitted, that the sufferers, their parents, relatives, and friends, are less interested in their welfare and protection, than those who are united to them only by the feeble ties of political connexion.

With all the means of information furnished by every motive of duty, and every inducement of interest, we are constrained to say, that this evil of impressment has been grossly exaggerated; that we have reason to believe, an honest and fair proposal, as honestly and fairly executed, to exclude the subjects of Great Britain from the service, would have much more effectually relieved our own seamen, and more essentially advanced their interest, than a resort to war; that the true interests of the United States coincide with the policy adopted by all other countries; and that we should be more independent, our seamen better protected, and our country eventually more prosperous, by renouncing altogether the pretension of screening and employing British seamen.

The doctrine of natural allegiance is too well founded, has been too long established, and is too consonant with the permanent interest, the peace and independence of all nations, to be disturbed for the purpose of substituting in its place certain visionary notions, to which the French Revolution gave birth, and which, though long since exploded there, seem still to have an unhappy influence in our country.

Having thus found the avowed causes of the war, and especially the motive for a perseverance in it, so wholly inadequate, to justify the adoption of that policy, we have been obliged to resort to other and more concealed motives. We cannot, however, without the most conclusive evidence, believe, although the measures and language of some high public functionaries indicate the fact, that ambition and not justice, a lust of conquest and not a defence of endangered rights, are among the real causes of perseverance in our present hostilities.

Must we then add another example to the catalogue of Republics which have been ruined by a spirit of foreign conquest? Have we no regard to the solemn professions we have so often repeated, none to the example, none to the precepts of Washington? Is it possible, either to acquire, or to maintain, extensive foreign conquest, without powerful standing armies? And did such armies ever long permit the people who were so imprudent as to raise and maintain them, to enjoy their liberties?

Instances of military oppression have already occurred among us; and a watchful people, jealous of their rights, must have observed some attempts to control their elections, and to prostrate the civil before the military authority. If the language of some men high in office—if the establishment of a chain of military posts in the interior of our country—if the extensive preparations which are made in quarters where invasion cannot be feared, and the total abandonment and neglect of that part of our country where alone it can be apprehended, have excited our anxiety and alarm, as to the real projects of our rulers, these emotions have not been diminished by the recent invasion, seizure, and occupation of the territory of a peaceable and unoffending neighbor.

If war must have been the portion of these United States—if they were destined by Providence to march the downward road to slavery, through foreign conquest and military usurpation, your remonstrants regret that such a moment and such an occasion should have been chosen for the experiment; that while the oppressed nations of Europe are making a magnanimous and glorious effort against the common enemy of free States, we alone—the descendants of the pilgrims—sworn foes to civil and religious slavery, should voluntarily co-operate with the oppressor to bind other nations in his chains; that, while diverting the forces of one of his enemies from the mighty conflict, we should endanger the defenceless territories of another, in whose ports the flag of our independence was first permitted to wave, now struggling for existence, beneath his iron grasp.

Permit the Legislature of this Commonwealth, whose citizens have been ever zealous in the cause of freedom, and who contributed their utmost efforts for the adoption of that Constitution under which, in former times, we enjoyed so much prosperity, most respectfully, but earnestly to entreat and conjure the constituted authorities of the nation, by the regard due to our liberties, to our union, to our civil compact, already infringed—to pause before it be too late. Let the sober, considerate, and honorable Representatives of our sister States, in which different councils prevail, ask themselves—

Were not the territories of the United States sufficiently extensive before the annexation of Louisiana, the projected reduction of Canada, and seizure of West Florida?

Had we not millions upon millions of acres of uncultivated wilderness, scarcely explored by civilized man?

Could these acquisitions be held as conquered provinces without powerful standing armies? and would they not, like other infant colonies, serve as perpetual drains of the blood and treasure of these United States? Or, is it seriously intended to adopt the dangerous project of forming them into new States, and admitting them into the Union, without the express consent of every member of the original confederacy? Would not such a measure have a direct tendency to destroy the obligations of that compact, by which alone our Union is maintained?

Already have we witnessed the formation and admission of one State beyond the territorial limits of the United States, and this, too, in opposition to the wishes and efforts, as well as in violation of the rights and interests of some of the parties to that compact; and the determination to continue that practice, and thereby to extend our Republic to regions hitherto unexplored, or peopled by inhabitants whose habits, language, religion, and laws are repugnant to the genius of our Government, is openly avowed.

Against a practice so hostile to the rights, the interests, the safety of this State, and so destructive to her political power; so subversive of the spirit of the Constitution, and the very principles upon which it is founded; your remonstrants, in the name and behalf of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, feel it their duty to enter their most deliberate and solemn protest.

If an extensive confederated Republic is to be maintained, and we most fervently pray that it may, it can only be by a free communication of the grievances felt and the evils apprehended, by any of its members, and by a prompt and liberal remedy. The same spirit of concession which dictated the formation and adoption of the Constitution, should be kept in permanent and perpetual exercise.

The blessings of Government, its vigilance, its protection, its rewards, should be equally and impartially distributed, and its burdens as equally and fairly imposed. No portion of the Union ought to be sacrificed to the local interest, passions, or aggrandizement of others. It cannot, however, be denied, that causes have occurred to disturb the balance, which, when adjusted, was intended to form the principal security of our present compact. But the remedy is in the power of Congress, and we look to their wisdom for its efficacious and speedy application.

The chief motive which influenced the Eastern States to abolish the old confederation, and to surrender a greater share of their own Sovereign power, as appears by the recent history of those times, was the expectation that their commerce would be better protected by the National Government.

The hardy people of the North stood in no need of the aid of the South, to protect them in their liberties. For this they could safely rely, as they always had done, on their own valor. But it was an important object with them, that every aid, facility, and encouragement, should be given to that commerce upon which their prosperity almost exclusively depended.

To insure this great object, a very unequal proportion of political power was conceded to the Southern States. The representation of slaves was the price paid by the Northern States for the stipulated protection and encouragement of their trade, and for an agreement of the Southern members of the Union, that the public burdens should be apportioned according to representation. Experience, however, has proved, that although the contract on our part has been faithfully fulfilled, both these considerations have utterly failed.

Indications of a spirit hostile to commerce were early visible among some of those who now control the destinies of our Republic. But the Father of his Country then presided in our Councils, and this spirit was vanquished. Under the influence of the wise, and liberal, and magnanimous system, adopted and pursued by his Administration, commerce was indeed cherished, extended and protected; and the stipulations of the Constitution were fulfilled, in sincerity and good faith.

Since that period, however, the same spirit has arisen, and has exhibited an unrelenting severity in the exercise of its sway—until, at length, by a series of restrictions, utterly destructive of the calculations of the merchant—by prohibitions and double duties—by embargoes and non-intercourse—and, lastly, by war, the poor remains of the commerce which once covered the ocean with its sails, have been nearly annihilated.

Nor has the other part of the consideration been better fulfilled—taxation has never, except in one instance, and that the one-hundredth part only of the revenue raised under the Constitution, been apportioned according to representation; and with what reluctance it was then submitted to by the Southern States, and with what tardiness it was even partially collected, public records will determine.

Of the two hundred and fifteen millions of dollars derived by the United States, under the operation of the Federal Government, Massachusetts has paid upwards of forty millions—an amount beyond all proportion to her political weight in the Union.

If, therefore, the revenues, derived from this Commonwealth, and paid into the National Treasury, had been preserved in her own, she would have been fully competent to her own defence, and would not have been obliged to solicit, nor experience the injustice of a refusal of the arms, for which she has long since paid, and which were her due from the General Government. What good cause can be assigned for this refusal, your remonstrants are wholly unable to determine. No discretion is by law vested in any officer of the Government, in relation to this subject. Its provisions are simple, plain, and peremptory. Your remonstrants, therefore, cannot but express their astonishment, that the State of Massachusetts, possessing a seacoast more extensive and populous than that of any other State in the Union, and a defenceless frontier by land, should not only be entirely abandoned by the Government whose duty it is to protect her, but should also be refused the arms for her own defence to which she is by law entitled. They cannot, however, permit themselves to doubt, that Congress will forthwith adopt such measures, as will render to this Commonwealth that justice which the Executive Department has refused.

If the war in which we have been rashly plunged was undertaken to appease the resentment, or secure the favor of France, deep and humiliating must be our disappointment. For, although the Emperor is lavish in his professions of "love for the American people," applauds our ready self-devotion, and declares "that our commerce and our prosperity are within the scope of his policy," yet no reparation has been made or offered for the many outrages, indignities, and insults he has inflicted on our Government, nor for the unnumbered millions of which he has plundered our citizens. And when we consider the course of policy pursued by our Rulers, in their external relations and commercial restrictions, from the prohibition of our trade to St. Domingo, to the declaration of war against Great Britain; that this course often received his open approbation, and was not unfrequently conformable to the system which he himself has adopted—when we consider also the mysterious secrecy which has veiled the correspondence of the two Governments from our view; and, above all, when we consider, that in many instances the most important measures of our Government have been anticipated in Paris long before they were known to the American people, we cannot conceal our anxiety and alarm for the honor and independence of our country. And we most fervently pray, that the sacrifices we have already made, like the early concessions of Spain and Portugal, of Prussia and Sweden, may not be the preludes to new demands and new concessions, and that we may be preserved from all political connexion with the common enemy of civil liberty.

To the constituted authorities of our country we have now stated our opinions and made known our complaints—opinions, the result of deliberate reflection, and complaints "wrung from us by the tortures of that cruel policy" which has brought the good people of this Commonwealth to the verge of ruin. A policy which has annihilated that commerce so essential to their prosperity; increased their burdens, while it has diminished their means of support; provided for the establishment of an immense standing army, dangerous to their liberties, and irreconcilable with the genius of their Constitution; destroyed their just and Constitutional weight in the General Government; and, by involving them in a disastrous war, has placed in the power of the enemy the control of the fisheries—a treasure of more value to the country than all the territories for which we are contending, and which furnished the only means of subsistence to thousands of our citizens—the great nursery of our seamen—and the right to which can never be abandoned by New England.

Under such circumstances, silence towards the Government would be treachery to the people. In making this solemn representation of our sufferings and our dangers, we have been influenced only by the duty which we owe to our constituents and our country, to our consciences, and the memory of our fathers. And to the Searcher of all hearts we appeal for the purity of our motives, and the sincerity of our declarations.

Far from wishing to embarrass the Administration in any of their negotiations for peace, we cannot but express our regret, that they should not have evinced a sincere desire for this great object, by accepting some of the repeated overtures made by the enemy for the suspension of hostilities. And permit us, in conclusion, most earnestly to request, that measures may immediately be adopted to stay the sword of the destroyer, and to prevent the further effusion of human blood; that our invading armies may be forthwith recalled within our own territories; and that every effort of our Rulers may be speedily directed to the attainment of a just and honorable peace; that mutual confidence and commercial prosperity may be again restored to our distracted and suffering country; and that by an upright and faithful administration of our Government, in the true spirit of the Constitution, its blessings may be equally diffused to every portion of the Union.

In the House of Representatives, June 14, 1813. Read and accepted. Sent up for concurrence.

TIMOTHY BIGELOW, Speaker.

In the Senate, June 15th, 1813, read and concurred.

JOHN PHILLIPS, President.

After the reading of the remonstrance was concluded—

Mr. PICKERING moved to refer the memorial to a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. ROBERTSON objected to the reference. He had heard a part of this remonstrance read with great concern, and it should never be referred to any Committee of the House with his consent. He could not consent that that part of the remonstrance which brought into view anything relating to the sovereignty of Louisiana, should be made a question before this House or any committee of the House. He called upon intelligent members on all sides of the House to frown upon anything which should place that State in a light different from any other. The State of Louisiana had been admitted into the Union by laws solemnly passed; she had been guilty of no act which could have a tendency to deprive Massachusetts of any right, or any weight in the Union. That State had still her Constitutional weight in the nation; she had all the officers belonging to her, and was deprived of no right to which any other State was entitled. If she had not that influence in the nation which she wished, she certainly would not look for its diminution in the abridgment of any Constitutional right. She has experienced none. She may look to the diminution of her influence, if she has experienced any, to any other cause quite as rationally as to the introduction of Louisiana into the Union. Long before that event, the Eastern States had lost a considerable portion of that influence which they had previously possessed in the Union. The operation of the provisions of the Constitution had produced that effect. As it regarded that portion of the remonstrance which adverts to the war in which we are engaged, to the manner in which it has been conducted, to the refusal of arms, &c.—these portions of the remonstrance might give rise to some act, and might or might not be a proper subject of inquiry by the House of Representatives. But what act could grow out of that part complaining of the introduction of Louisiana into the Union? Would this House be so lost to the rights of Louisiana, rights equal to those of any other State; would it be so lost to the rights of that State as to take into consideration the petulant and unfounded complaints against the participation of that State in the Union? Was not every State in the Union interested in guarding against the slightest approach to the investigation of the sovereign rights of States in the Union? Mr. R. said he could not, consistently with his duty to the respectable State he represented, sit silent whilst observations which he would term at least indelicate towards it, were proposed to be seriously taken into consideration by the House; to have withheld his protest on this occasion, would have manifested a want of respect to his constituents and to himself, a want of feeling, which he hoped never to be guilty of. His only object being to express his sentiments on so much of the memorial as relates to Louisiana, he moved to except from the general reference of this memorial so much of it as relates to the admission of Louisiana into the Union.

Mr. FISK, of New York, said he would make a motion, which would supersede the motion of the gentleman from Louisiana, that the petition should lie on the table; which he did from a belief that it would be the most proper course the House could take with an instrument like that now under consideration—a paper without a parallel, he believed, in the history of Government, certainly unprecedented in this Government. That paper commences with reminding us of our duty; it may not here be improper to reflect for a moment on the nature of our duties—on what are our Constitutional rights and privileges, and what are the rights and privileges of that body which has come forward with this remonstrance. The Constitution has granted to us expressly and exclusively the power of declaring war, and raising armies, &c. No one can contend that these powers belong to the individual States; and whilst the right of remonstrance against the measures of Government cannot be questioned, the occasion will rarely present itself when the Legislature of a State could be authorized to erect themselves into a board of censors on the conduct of the General Government. Mr. F. then adverted to the language of this document in relation to the war. If it should be referred to a Committee of the whole House on the State of the Union, in what an absurd dilemma would the national councils be involved? A year ago they deemed it necessary to declare war—and now, without an overture on the part of the enemy, whilst the arm of the nation is extended, to go into a committee on such strange productions as this, would tend to paralyze the national arm, and violate the feelings (he had almost said the character) of the people who sent us here. The memorial on the table, Mr. F. said, among other insinuations against the majority of the House and nation, contained one which, if applied to him individually, he would pronounce false and unfounded—he meant the charge of foreign influence. He would not for a moment stoop to investigate such a charge. The general tenor of the remonstrance, indeed, Mr. F. said, was indecorous in manner and erroneous in fact.

It would be well, perhaps, in determining what course this body ought to pursue in relation to that paper, to reflect for a moment what had been the history of this Government for eight or ten years past. Within that time, remonstrances had been addressed to this Legislature from the same source exactly contradictory of each other. In 1803 and 1804, our tables were loaded with remonstrances against injuries of the belligerents, particularly of England. We were then told that the measures of England were calculated for the destruction of our commerce—the magnanimity and spirit of the Government were invoked to put forth its arm and save Massachusetts from the losses she incurred by British depredations on our commerce. Our Government sent a Minister Extraordinary to England. The people having become afterwards disgusted with a protracted diplomatic discussion, restrictive measures were resorted to, to enforce negotiation, not to destroy commerce. The embargo was next resorted to, but that and all other measure were opposed by the party which has forwarded this memorial, notwithstanding that section of the Union had emphatically called on us to protect their interests. They opposed the very measures they had called for—because, in calling on the General Government to act, they had submitted the mode of action to its discretion. It was said the British Government never would negotiate under our restrictive measures, but they did—and Erskine's arrangement was made. [Mr. F. was here called to order by a gentleman on the Federal side. The SPEAKER said, Mr. F. had ranged too widely in the debate.] Mr. F. said, he would not persist if out of order; nor even if it were unpleasant, as it appeared to be to gentlemen on the other side of the House, to hear the recapitulation of facts in relation to our foreign concerns. He must plead, as his excuse for ranging widely on this occasion, the singularity of the paper now before the House. It is not expected by the warmest advocate of the memorial, if advocate it has in this House, that we can repeal our declaration of war, and recall our Army and Navy from the field, under present circumstances. And in respect to Louisiana, he considered it equally improper to question her rights or sovereignty as it would be to question those of New York. He could not, therefore, on any view of the subject, consent to refer this remonstrance.

Mr. PICKERING waived his motion for reference to a Committee of the Whole; he had no objection that for the present the memorial should lie on the table. He would at this time make a remark or two only, in reply to what had fallen from the gentleman from Louisiana. I was, said Mr. P., a member of the Senate, when the treaty ceding Louisiana to us, was ratified. My colleague, John Quincy Adams, voted for its ratification. I beg leave to say, there was not a man then in the Senate who supposed another State might be admitted beyond the original boundary of the Union. In proof of which, I recollect that Mr. Adams argued that the Constitution might be so amended as to admit the introduction of such States; and, a very few days after the ratification of the treaty just mentioned, he laid upon the table of the Senate a proposition so to amend the Constitution.

Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, said, that although in his seat, he had not heard the memorial read, because the gentleman's back was towards him. He had therefore had no opportunity of judging of its contents. As he doubted whether it was conformable to rule that papers should receive their customary reading from members of the House, he hoped the memorial would be read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER decided that the reading by a member was a reading in the view of the rule.

Mr. REEA then moved that the memorial be read a second time.

For the motion, 65; against it, 90.

Mr. ALSTON said he did not rise now for the purpose of entering into any argument on the merits of this remonstrance. If he had understood the gentleman from Massachusetts correctly, he had said that there was not a Senator in 1804 who believed that new States might be admitted beyond the original boundary of the Union.

Mr. PICKERING explained. He did not remember to have heard that a word was said by any member of the Senate in his place intimating that the Constitution, as it then existed, authorized the admission into the Union of any territory beyond its original limits. And that this general opinion prevailed was further proved, by the fact, that in a few days after the treaty passed the Senate, Mr. ADAMS offered an amendment to the Constitution on this head.

Mr. ALSTON said, that if the gentleman was a member of the Senate at the time, he could put him in mind of a debate, which took place there, which would induce him to retract the opinion he had just expressed. When the same subject was under discussion, a member of the Senate from South Carolina, who was in the Convention which framed the Constitution, rose and read that part of the Constitution which authorizes the admission of new States into the Union, and declared that the member who originally moved that article in the Convention, said, at the time he offered it, that he had in his eye the conquest of Canada, not of Louisiana, but what amounts to the same thing in principle, of a territory not then belonging to the United States. This was said with the doors open; and Mr. A. said he had believed, after that, that there was not a member of the Senate, unless it was Mr. ADAMS, who had committed himself, that did not believe that the true construction was, that Congress might erect new States out of territory they might acquire. This fact must be in the recollection of every person then a member of Congress.

Mr. PICKERING said he had been a member at that time, and had not the slightest recollection of such an observation having been made as that just referred to. In confirmation of the statement he had made on this head, he recollected an opinion he had then made up, that though no one then pretended that the Constitution authorized the admission of this territory, yet it would be admitted into the Union in process of time. This opinion satisfied him, that, whatever others might hear, nothing had come to his ears at that time contradicting the impression he had stated.

Remonstrance of Massachusetts.

H. OF R.

Mr. WRIGHT said he was a member of the Senate, and present at the ratification of the Louisiana Treaty; and he believed the honorable gentleman who presented this memorial opposed the ratification of that treaty, as he had done almost every act which appeared to receive the sanction of Administration. His colleague, (Mr. ADAMS,) however, was then taking a review of his conduct, and becoming friendly to the measures of the Administration. He was so anxious for the admission of Louisiana into our Union, that he declared his intention, if necessary, to move an amendment to the Constitution with that view. And I do well recollect, said Mr. W., the dialogue embracing the remark which has been quoted of a Senator from South Carolina.

The SPEAKER here recommended that a stop should be put to this desultory debate; and frequently in the course of the following debate endeavored to limit the members to a discussion of the mere question before them.

Mr. BIGELOW said that this petition contained important matter; that it was decent and respectful in its terms, and entitled to attention. He hoped, therefore, as many had complained that they had not heard it read, that it would be printed for general information. He hoped that a spirit of conciliation would prevail on all sides; that the reasons urged by the Legislature of Massachusetts might be fairly and candidly considered. If those reasons had weight, let the grievances complained of be redressed. If not, let the people of that State be convinced of their error by the answer to be returned to them. Mr. B. moved to print the remonstrance.

Mr. WRIGHT hoped the remonstrance would not be printed. He hoped nobody wanted a copy of it; sure he was that he did not. As to referring it to a committee, he should be happy to see it referred to the Attorney General of Massachusetts, to whom he thought its libellous character entitled it to be sent.

A conversation took place between Messrs. ROBERTS, McKEE, and BIGELOW, on the former practice of the House in printing papers expressive of the sense of the Legislatures of States in relation to the measures of the General Government.

Mr. MONTGOMERY considered it important that the House should meet this paper, and expose its fallacy, which they could not be enabled to do as well from its bare reading as if it were printed and before them. He wished an opportunity for himself of examining it at leisure, and reading it over and over again. He wished at the same time that the House should meet its reasoning and confute it, as he believed they might readily do.

Mr. MACON regretted that any objection had been made to printing this paper. If we have been in error, said he, no man can object to being convinced of it. It is certainly impossible for any man to understand distinctly so long a paper from merely hearing it read. Suppose this representation had been a very able argument to show that our measures are correct, should we object to its publication? I apprehend not. Massachusetts has done what other States have done before her. She has thought proper to animadvert on our proceedings; and she is entitled to precisely the same respect as every other State, and every other State to the same respect as her. We come here as equals, and I hope as brothers. All truth asks is fair play. If truth be on our side, as I verily believe it is, we are impregnable. The cause of truth will prevail in the end.

Mr. ROBERTSON said he could not for his part consent that so much of this memorial as relates to Louisiana should even be printed. He could not consent to give countenance in any way to a paper which speaks of the introduction of Louisiana into the Union as a violation of the rights of any of the States. However the sentiments of that memorial in relation to other matters differed from his own, he had no objection to their circulation. But with respect to the question to which he had alluded, which ought not to be approached, which must not be acted on, he could consent to no act which should give to that paper, character or consequence in the eyes of the nation. He therefore moved to except, from the motion for printing, such part of the memorial as related to Louisiana.

In addition to the complete and conclusive reply already given to the gentleman from Massachusetts (Mr. PICKERING) he would say, that admitting the statement made by the gentleman to be true, as he was convinced the gentleman believed it to be, yet the United States were functus officio as to the introduction of this State into the Union. The question cannot now be moved in this House. As a Constitutional question, it may come before the Judiciary, the tribunal for deciding such questions; but he believed they would hardly undertake to discuss the constitutionality of the introduction of any State into the Union. I have endeavored, said Mr. R., to make no remarks which could be construed into an delicacy towards the State of Massachusetts; but is the language of the memorial delicate? Is it fair to the State of Louisiana, to act in this manner. There may be States in the Union whose religion, whose moral habits, whose permission of slavery, may be disagreeable to the State of Massachusetts; but all these things were known before, and at the time of the formation of our happy Union, and were not considered sufficient obstacles to prevent its formation. Shall they then be considered of sufficient importance to endanger its existence? I hope not.

Mr. WRIGHT asked, as a question of mere order, whether any paper was admissible in this House, charging the Government, in terms, with a violation of the Constitution.

The SPEAKER replied, that was a matter entirely for the decision of the House.

Mr. INGERSOLL said he should vote for printing this memorial entire, notwithstanding what appeared to him to be an excitement of just and honorable feeling in the gentleman from Louisiana against the part he wished to except. He should vote for printing it, because he was of opinion that it was high time to meet this memorial and all such papers on the floor of this House with reason and argument, instead of fervor and passion, which had generally been applied on similar occasions.

Mr. ROBERTS said he was still unfriendly to the printing of this memorial, if it were only for the perfect novelty of thus questioning the sovereignty of a State. He was of opinion that a question ought to be settled, preliminary to printing this paper, whether the sovereignty of a State ought in any way to be questioned. He hoped it would lie on the table and not be printed.

The question was taken on the remonstrance lying on the table, and carried without a division.

The question recurred on the motion to print the paper, and first on the amendment thereto proposed by Mr. ROBERTSON.

Mr. FISK of Vermont spoke in favor of printing. He considered the remonstrance of an extraordinary character, and, if not intended to effect some extraordinary purpose where it originated, the course now proposed to be taken would give it that effect. If the statements contained in that paper could not be met, it was high time that the party at whom they were levelled was out of power. If it should be refused a hearing, the impression would prevail that it was unanswerable. A spirit of dissatisfaction had reigned in the quarter whence this memorial came, though it had not before been presented to this House. This spirit of opposition would be the evil genius of the country, unless it was quieted by a decisive reply. This paper contained statements, which, with all the deference he was disposed to pay to the Legislature of Massachusetts, were erroneous and unfounded. These statements were before the people. Their good sense would doubtless refute them; but he also wished to see them refuted in this House.

Mr. FISK, of New York, opposed the printing, because no object appeared requiring it, as no Legislative act could grow out of it.

Mr. RHEA spoke in favor of printing, because he had not been able to hear the paper read.

Mr. CALHOUN said if his vote for printing this memorial could be conceived as in any way countenancing the doctrines it contained, he certainly should not vote for it. He certainly never would countenance what might be considered a declaration of war by one State against another. When he gave a vote to publish this paper, he should do it because gentlemen had said they had not an opportunity of hearing it distinctly when it was read. As to the subject of the remonstrance, he was ready to meet it. Congress had declared war from necessity alone, and that they would always be willing and able to vindicate its justice and necessity, he had not the least doubt.

Mr. FARROW said he had not heard the whole of the remonstrance read, but he had heard more than enough of it. He regretted the consumption of time about this affair, and opposed its printing. Every member who wished had an opportunity to read it at the Clerk's table—he would assure those who were desirous of reading it, they would never find him in their way.

Mr. BRIB said he should vote against printing as unnecessary; because, when the subject should be taken up again, if no other gentleman did, he should move a reference of the memorial to a select committee, with the view of obtaining a detailed report on it. He considered the memorial, though addressed to this House, as an appeal to the people of Massachusetts, and of the United States, from the decision of Congress—he therefore wished a report which should expose the fallacy of its arguments.

Mr. WRIGHT said he had heard so much of the memorial when read as to know that it was indecorous and treasonable in its language, and charged the House with being under French influence, and with having violated the Constitution. He was opposed to the principle of the memorial, in all its moods and tenses. Gentlemen, he believed, were about to vote for printing this paper, who, if they had heard it read, would have spurned it from the table. Mr. W. said he had drawn up a resolution that the memorial was indecorous and ought not to be received. He recollected a memorable case in the Senate, of a memorial from certain Quakers denouncing all slaveholders as in the high road to the devil. The memorial was received and read, and afterwards leave was given to the memorialists to withdraw their memorial. The State of Massachusetts had been equally represented with other States, and its members heard on the subject of the declaration of war—and yet they now came forward and declared it unconstitutional. Surprise at this remonstrance, however, in a great degree ceases, when we reflect that it proceeded from the same body, and I have little doubt from the same pen, too, which the other day solemnly declared it was contrary to their religion to rejoice in the successes of the arms of their country.

Mr. BENSON said the gentleman need not wince so much at the charge of foreign influence. Did he not recollect calling the other day on the friends of Britain in this House to come forth, &c.

Mr. WRIGHT said the gentleman from New York was wrong. He had suppressed a part of the evidence; and whoever gives but half of the evidence in any case is guilty of suppressio veri. He had, on the occasion alluded to, quoted Castlereagh's words—"the friends of Great Britain in Congress." It was on record that he had used the expression, and Mr. W. had quoted it. It was for gentlemen on the other side to repel the charge.

Mr. BRIGHAM spoke in favor of treating this petition with all the respect due to its importance and the respectable source from which it came. He was sorry that a disposition was manifested to prevent the remonstrance from coming fairly before the House. This memorial had been addressed to Congress by Massachusetts in the day of her distress. Should not the people of that State have the liberty of stating their complaints? He should be sorry to see gentlemen frown on the petition of an individual, much less of the State of Massachusetts, for whom he claimed no other respect or distinction than that to which all the States in the Union were entitled.

Mr. BIGELOW adverted to the illiberality of placing reliance on the declarations of the agents of foreign Governments in relation to our parties at home. He quoted the French correspondence in 1797 or 1798, speaking with certainty of a party at the control of France in this country. Mr. B. said he did not make such a charge; but if the declaration of one foreign Minister was entitled to credit, the declaration of another foreign Minister was equally so.

Mr. MAON said, that whenever the subject of British or French influence was started in this House, the members did just what the two Governments of Great Britain and France, equal in wickedness, wished us to do—widening divisions already sufficiently obvious. Does either of those nations, said he, love a free Government? Has either of them ever protected a free Government anywhere? If those Governments ever have a secret understanding with people among us, they will not let you know with whom; but they will throw out hints, and make public declarations and insinuations, to sow distrust among a people who are free, and whom they therefore envy and hate. Let us not then help them in the work, but bear with one another.

Mr. BAYLIES rose to support the remonstrance. Being a Representative from the State which had transmitted it—a State whose blood had flowed as freely as that of any other in support of our independence; a State which contributed as much to support it as any other—it was certainly incumbent on him, to do his utmost that this memorial should be disposed of in a respectful manner. Why had this memorial, which all appeared to admit to be couched in respectful language, called forth the indignation of gentlemen? The Legislature, availing itself of its Constitutional right, had performed that duty which, as guardians of the people's rights, they owed to their constituents; and he trusted, whatever might be said out of the House, that the doctrine never would be countenanced on this floor, that after a measure has become a law, it is not admissible to oppose it. Mr. B. spoke of the sufferings of the people of Massachusetts as being very great, and the sentiments contained in the memorial very general. He urged a temperate consideration of it, and reply or refutation of it if the people were proved to be in error. The gentleman from Maryland had charged this with being a treasonable paper, and of course the Legislature as being guilty of treason. A proper respect for Massachusetts and himself, Mr. B. said, forbade any other reply to such remarks, than that the honorable gentleman was as ignorant of the principles of free Government as he was of the character of the people of Massachusetts.

The motion to except from printing that part of the memorial which relates to Louisiana, was negatived; and the memorial was ordered to be printed—yeas 108.

PROTEST OF MINORITY.

Mr. RICHARDSON presented an address of the minority of the Legislature of the State of Massachusetts, protesting against the statements and principles contained in the remonstrance above stated, as unseasonable in their origin, reprehensible in language, erroneous in facts, and pernicious in their effects.—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The Address is as follows:

Protest of the minority of the Legislature of Massachusetts to the remonstrance of the Legislature thereof against the war and other measures of the General Government.

To the Honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled—

The undersigned committee, chosen by the minority of the Senators and Representatives of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts, beg leave to represent, that they have perceived with extreme regret that the Legislature of this State, in their present session, have presented a remonstrance to Congress, denouncing the Administration of the General Government, reproaching the war as improper, impolitic, and unjust, impeaching the motives of the Congress which declared it, excusing and justifying all the aggressions and outrages of Great Britain, and charging a majority of the Representatives of the people with wantonness, ambition, oppression, and cruelty. While the Executive of the United States is steadily pursuing that course of policy which alone can secure a safe, equitable, honorable, and permanent peace, and are actually negotiating to effect it, it is impossible to conceive what good motive could induce the Legislature of this State to vote a remonstrance so treasonable in its origin, reprehensible in its language, erroneous in its facts and principles, and pernicious in its effects.

Who that is American can but feel indignant to hear it stated by the Legislature of a State that we ought to have resisted the French decrees, agreeably to the demand of the British Government? That we have seduced her seamen from their allegiance, and that we have invaded the territory of a peaceable and unfending neighbor? Where is the man, who values his reputation, who would not indignantly frown at the insinuation, that war was waged from motives of ambition or lust of conquest? that we are leagued with France to oppress the European nations, and that our Government have established a chain of military posts "to prostrate the civil to the military authority?" And what man, not altogether exclusively British, can, without the deepest mortification, read a remonstrance which, in time of war and pending negotiation, should take the enemy's ground, support their claims, and justify their aggressions? We assure the Congress and people of the United States that we utterly protest against the statements and principles contained in that humiliating remonstrance. It appears to us too much like the attempt of a disappointed and malignant faction, who, to obtain power, would trample on the rights and liberties of their country. We do not, however, apprehend that any faction in this country have either the power or the nerve to effect a purpose of this sort. We trust and sincerely believe that the people would resist, and effectually suppress, every attempt to sever or weaken our bond of Union. We are aware that it is in times of calamity and war that ambitious and designing men will be tempted to stir up the people to opposition and rebellion. But we are assured that a large majority of the people of this State would, at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, resist all opposition to the laws and government of their country. We believe the war to be just and necessary; that the Government have invariably maintained strict justice and impartiality towards the belligerents of Europe; that they have submitted to an accumulation of wrongs which no other nation would have endured; they have negotiated until negotiation was vain; that it is their intention, as it is their duty, to protect the rights of commerce and of sailors, "peaceably if they can, forcibly if they must;" that since the pretended repeal of the Orders in Council, every pacific advance has been made, both by the Executive and by Congress, which was consistent with the rights and honor of the nation; and that we are willing to endure all the evils and privations of this war, and to expend our property and our blood in its prosecution. We hope the Legislature of Massachusetts have better evidence of their consistency, prudence, patriotism, and love of peace, than is contained in their extraordinary remonstrance.

We wish for peace, but we fear that this remonstrance, if it has any effect, will tend to prevent rather than to accomplish it. We hope that the very proper course adopted by the Administration to effect a peace, will meet with the success to which it is entitled. But should Great Britain, regardless of the numerous wrongs she has inflicted on us, and calculating on her power, or encouraged by her friends in America, persist in her hostile pretensions, we have no doubt but the people of this State will cordially, actively, and zealously come forward and lend their aid in the prosecution of the war—until our rights are established on a permanent basis.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

On motion of Mr. Fisk of New York, the House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolution, yesterday submitted by him, for imposing a duty on spirits.

The resolution having been again read—

MR. INGERSOLL read the following resolutions, which he proposed to offer as amendatory of and additional to that of Mr. Fisk:

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of taxing all successions to the estates of persons dying after the — day of — next, within the United States, whenever such decedent shall leave a clear estate, real, personal, or mixed, worth five hundred dollars; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of taxing all ascertainable income from all estates, real, personal, and mixed, whenever the yearly amount of income shall exceed five hundred dollars; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of taxing all law suits, offices, and pensions; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

MR. INGERSOLL.—Mr. Chairman, as long as the business of this session proceeded without interruption, I held myself bound, by a sense of imperious public duty, to refrain from disturbing it with any observations of mine: and on all the various subjects of debate have never taken the floor, except for a few minutes at an early day after our meeting, when I deemed it necessary to explain my vote to those against whom I gave it. But the harmony and regularity of our progress being now unfortunately broken up by the resolution of the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. Fisk,) and we in danger, I am afraid, of being cast adrift upon a sea of troubles, the same sense of public propriety which enjoined silence on me heretofore, requires that I should now solicit your patience, and that of the Committee, which I am apprehensive I shall severely exercise, during the discussion of the elaborate and uninteresting matters involved in the subject of taxation. Tedious and dull as they are intrinsically, they will prove peculiarly so in my treatment, because, besides having no ability to impart to them an extraordinary interest, I shall endeavor to restrict myself to the subject to be kept in view. Consecrated as I consider this special session to this special deliberation, and anxious to afford, as far as I am able, without regard to minor considerations, a good system of permanent and productive internal revenue, I beg leave to disclaim all mere party and State professions, to divest myself of their livery, and to approach the inquiry with no other inclination than that for the fairest and most eligible system. I will not, therefore, inflame the debate with the causes of the war which has rendered taxes indispensable. It is enough to say that war, without taxes, is a body without a soul. The physical material you may have without finance; but that moral momentum must be wanting, which gives to the physical material its movement and alacrity. The armor of war is, to be sure, fabricated of iron, but it never will be lasting unless burnished with gold; nor can the attitude of war be what it ought to be—an attitude of defiance and annoyance to the enemy, of protection and safeguard to us—unless it be erected on a well-founded Treasury, capable of perpetual reproductiveness and never-failing replenishment.

The Secretary of the Treasury has recommended taxes to our enactment, as "necessary evils." I do not mean my honorable friend and most worthy townsman, the acting Secretary of the Treasury, but that distinguished Secretary of the Treasury who is now, I suppose, about half seas over on his way to the arctic circle, in pursuit of peace; intoxicated, I am afraid, with vain hopes of at least a very doubtful and dangerous success—a success reposed on the remote and uncertain mediation of a foreign empire, rather than the native energies of our own. Most heartily, for my part, do I wish the Russian mission a speedy accomplishment of all its objects! But, though I have avoided inflaming this debate with a recapitulation of the causes of this just war, permit me to avail myself of this occasion to throw in very briefly my ideas of its legitimate progress and proper termination. If I differ in opinion with any of my friends, as it is an honest difference, there can be no impropriety in my exhibiting the grounds of the sentiments I entertain. I am one of the last individuals in this House who would wantonly utter a disrespectful or ungracious sentiment concerning any of the measures of that Administration, to which I am attached, or toward that excellent person in particular, who, so much to the interest and satisfaction of his country, fills the Executive Magistracy of these United States; whose strong and pervading hold on the confidence and affections of his fellow-citizens have been signally proved within these last few days, by the almost universal expression of their fervent wishes for his recovery from the illness with which he has been visited, and his restoration to the full enjoyment of those eminent faculties which have always been so exemplarily exerted in the purest public service. But, sir, I espoused this just and inevitable war, not because it was a measure of the present Administration—and I am wedded to its fortunes—not merely because the present Administration is intrusted with its prosecution. My affiance is founded on higher and deeper, I will add, nobler principles—principles which will outlive this and every other Administration. I support, and will continue to support, this war, so long as I shall remain in the conscientious belief, together with the majority of the American people, that the hostilities we ought to be waging are indispensable to the welfare, the character, the union, the existence of the nation.

Sir, having said thus much, let me add, with a full foresight of the responsibility I incur—having well considered what I am about to say—and prompted in its public declaration by a powerful sense of public duty, I proceed to add, that I am afraid this war has been mortified with too pacific an aspect; I fear its vigor has been cramped for the purpose of pampering a premature peace. I am as warm a friend to peace as any man, and would subscribe to it on as moderate terms; but after war has been declared, in my humble apprehension, peace-seeking is not the avenue to peace, is not pacific policy. If this war had been waged with a boldness, such as has marked our incessant endeavors to put a stop to it, which have followed each other ever since war was declared, in an increasing ratio of iteration and intensity, I have no doubt that the enemy, long before now, would have been panting for peace, pent up within the walls of Quebec, if indeed even the last resort of his annoyance, the ultima thule of his foothold on the North American continent had not been in your safekeeping, a pledge, a mortgage, for a permanent pacification. Instead of which, what is the fact? Turn your eyes, sir, on that quarter, where all the eyes of this country are rivetted in aching expectation; look to your lakes, and see a sufficient, well disciplined and competent force—an army which triumphs in every conflict, in spite of the errors of its commanders—see that army frustrate and idle on the strand, because you have not yet, after a twelve month's war like a peace, the complete command of those inland waters, which are as vitally essential to the well-being, the tranquillity, the security, the integrity of this Union, as the command of this District of Columbia; in my view of both subjects infinitely more so. And why is this? Because, at least I fear it is because, your sinews have been distended towards Russia, instead of Canada.

As soon as war was declared, I would have almost forgotten that we had such an office as the Department of State, much as I revere the irreproachable gentleman in that Department, and would have limited all my views to the belligerent departments, now so well replenished with talents, experience, and competency. At any rate I would have looked to them alone as long as a remorseless enemy was thundering at the gate with bombardment and conflagration in his train. If I am not mistaken in my historical recollections, in the year 1738, when the English Cabinet sent Mr. Keene as their Minister to Madrid, to treat of the embarrassments at that time superinduced between Spain and England, by the resistance, the pertinacious and invincible resistance, opposed by the latter to a claim of search exercised by the Spanish Guarda Costa in the American seas—precisely the same sort of search which England now as pertinaciously and triumphantly asserts—if I am not entirely mistaken, the Spanish Government repelled all discussion, while Admiral Haddock's fleet was hovering in the Mediterranean on the coast of Spain, and insisted on the withdrawal of that fleet as a preliminary sine qua non to any overture for peace. If I am not equally mistaken, at a much later period, so recently as 1807, when Sir John Duckworth forced the Dardanelles, and ranged his squadron before Constantinople, with springs on their cables and matches lighted, threatening the favorite residence of the Musselmén with the devastation of their mosques and harems; the Turk, sir, the despised, the outlawed Turk, who never paid a tax but by exaction, peremptorily refused to treat with his invaders, on any terms, until their batteries should no longer overhang the Turkish shore; and Admiral Duckworth with, if I am correct in my remembrance, Mr. Arbuthnot, an able Ambassador on board, as much so probably as Sir John Warren, found it necessary to withdraw without the Dardanelles, in order to open his negotiation. These, sir, indeed, are Moorish precedents, unbecoming perhaps American imitation. But I must confess, when I perceive how this conflict lingers in America, however rapidly it may be hastening, for aught I know of, to a profitable and goodly end in Russia, I do not think it due to that large portion of the community, whose opinions I am sure I speak on this occasion, to refrain from a decided but decorous expression of regret, that the Secretary of the Treasury should have gone—while yet a whole province, I mean the Territory of Michigan, is under the enemy's subjugation—that he should have gone, scorched with the fires of Havre and of Georgetown, coolly to sue for peace, under the influence of the North Pole.

Accede to such a mediation as that of Russia I always would, without a moment's hesitation, and by all fair means cherish the Russian alliance; for undoubtedly Russia is the only European Power of the first grade that has always treated America with respect and amity; though, to be sure, not to give Russia more credit than she is entitled to, we never have come in collision with her, and never can, unless we should disagree about the lands in Kamschatka. But move one single furlong from the American soil in quest of peace I never would, under any foreign auspices whatever. If we are to be victorious, this is the meridian for victory; if to be vanquished, this is the spot to fall upon. There is no wisdom, no policy, in courting peace; and I do anxiously trust that no hope of peace to be obtained in another hemisphere will be suffered to procrastinate the war in this.

After having said thus much on this subject, actuated by a sense of public duty, it is due to individual justice to add, it is due to my own sense of his superior merits, that I have as implicit reliance in the character of the absent Secretary of the Treasury, as I have in his great abilities; and that while I deprecate the policy of mediations and missions, and fear their result, I sincerely hope that it may be all that its best friends can desire.

To return from this digression, which, though not exactly appropriate to the subject, I nevertheless deemed it a duty to allow myself. The Secretary of the Treasury has recommended taxes to Congress as necessary evils. The Secretary is a great man; and it may be presumptuous in me to controvert any principle he asserts. But I must confess that I do not consider taxes as evils, however necessary they may be. In my inconsiderable opinion, temporary wars are not evils; nor permanent taxes; and however calamitous and deplorable long and ambitious wars undoubtedly are, I think, for my part, that the present will prove to be a blessed war, should it have no other effect than to give the United States a good system of permanent internal revenue. All the treasure and all the blood will be cheaply and most beneficially bestowed, if, besides the attainment of other objects, the present conflict with Great Britain should cause the arrangement of a plan of just and productive taxation.

In debate the other day on the resolutions of the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. WEBSTER,) an honorable gentleman opposite to me, from New York, (Mr. SHEPHERD,) in an ecstasy of fermented spirit—I mean the spirit of the mind—was betrayed into certain animadversions on individuals, whom I think it proper to exhibit to that mistaken gentleman in their true characters. This explanation is due as well to the persons so roundly called in question, as to the honorable gentleman from New York himself, who hardly could have meant all the evil he uttered in his political delirium, and who, as he appears to have the precepts of the Gospel familiar to his lips, no doubt has its principles engraven on his heart, and will be happy himself that I should prove to him how much he wronged the persons he denounced. That gentleman, sir, stigmatized the contributors to the late loans with some unhandsome epithets which I shall not repeat, calling them, in effect, delinquent members of his own party. That honorable gentleman has the honor to represent on this floor some portion of the great State of New York—unquestionably the first State in the Union—an acknowledgment I must needs make, though I have the honor to represent in part a State which claims at least a secondary rank. What particular district of New York he represents, I am not informed of; but he will permit me to assure him, that the principal contributor to the late loan is a gentleman who, within the last four years, has invested upwards of five hundred thousand dollars in the soil of New York, on the banks of the St. Lawrence, and who, therefore, feels, probably, as deep an interest in this country as, perhaps, the honorable gentleman does himself. What the politics of the gentleman alluded to are, I declare I do not know, though I enjoy the pleasure of his acquaintance; and I much doubt whether he has thought it necessary to adopt any; but, together with his great opulence, he has certainly always been distinguished for the goodness of his heart, the integrity and liberality of his nature, the hospitality of his house, and his peculiar talent of perceiving when, how, and where, to appropriate his large funds to the best advantage. Another of the principal contributors to the loan is a fellow-townsmen of mine, who, by thirty years of indefatigable and prosperous attention to mercantile business, is generally supposed to have amassed a solid fortune of at least two millions of dollars; and who, upon the dissolution of the charter of the late Bank of the United States, was affluent enough to purchase the edifice belonging to that institution, together, I believe, with most of the specie in their vaults, and to continue on the foundation, distributing the discounts and pecuniary benefits of such an extensive establishment to the commercial community; a citizen who, some years ago, when Philadelphia was afflicted by a pestilence, and all those inhabitants fled away from the scene of desolation who had the means of escape; who staid behind not to watch his treasure, not to count his gold, but “to plunge into the infection of hospitals, to survey the mansions of sorrow and pain, to remember the forgotten, to attend to the neglected, to visit the forsaken,” and I will add, as I believe I may with strict propriety, to administer even the rites of sepulture to those who had not a solitary friend left with them for the performance of such sad ceremonies. This gentleman, I can assure the honorable member from New York, is no delinquent partisan of his; but for thirty years has always been a firm, though unmeddling, a resolute, and consistent Republican. A third of the chief contributors to the late loan is, as I have generally understood, one of the greatest capitalists of the city of New York; as little deserving of the aspersions of the honorable gentleman from that State, since he, too, unless I am much mistaken, belongs to that class of Americans who do not fall in with the political exclusiveness of that honorable gentleman, who has so boldly laid claim—I am endeavoring to show with what justice—to all the capital, as well as all the virtue, and of course all the talents, of the community. A fourth of these upbraided delinquents is an inhabitant of Salem or Boston, though I am not certain whether he had an opportunity of coming in for a share of the loan of 1813, but who, at all events, I believe, subscribed most liberally to that of 1812; and who, far from meriting the distorted and wholly unfounded crimination of the honorable gentleman from New York, is like the others I have exculpated—a citizen, at the same time, of immense wealth, and sterling republicanism. There was, I think, a fifth large subscriber, a rich and respectable merchant of Baltimore, who is, I am informed, of the political domination of those with whom the honorable gentleman from New York acts; but who, as I am not disposed to follow the illiberal example of that honorable gentleman, it gives me pleasure to add, I have always considered, instead of a delinquent, rather a high-toned partisan; but, nevertheless, a man amiable in his manners and character, and entirely exempt from any of the faults imputed by the sweeping invective of the honorable gentleman from New York.

The Ways and Means.

That honorable gentleman could not have been aware of the mischief he imprecated on his own head, in common with the heads of all his other countrymen, without discrimination, when he suffered himself to be the assailant of public credit. Sir, as inestimable as I consider the American Union to American prosperity, I have no hesitation in declaring that I hold public credit to be of infinitely greater importance. It is the rock of our national salvation. It is that to which foreign Powers look as the base of our endurance. Our Union is undoubtedly essential to ourselves; but other nations care very little for our Union, and would destroy it if they could, as you, Mr. Chairman, very justly observed on this floor this morning. But as long as our public credit continues unimpaired, all nations must continue to respect us; as soon as it sinks, to despise us. Does the honorable gentleman from New York imagine—does any one suppose—that every species of property would not be depreciated with the fall of public credit? Do they think, can they think, that public faith may decline, and yet private property maintain its present estimation? If so, they egregiously deceive themselves. Lands, houses, personal estate, money, even the circulating medium of the country, would all lose their value with the destruction or diminution of the public credit and faith; for they would cease to represent and to enable the purchase of those comforts to which money and property afford titles for the enjoyment.

Whether it would be possible, and how long, to carry on the belligerent operations of Government by loans alone, without taxes pledged for their regular and faithful redemption; and whether loans, as a system, be a good or a bad, I am not now about to inquire, though I am inclined to believe, from the abundance of money in the country, and the facility with which it has been procured, provided a high interest is offered, that perhaps for some time it would not be impracticable to obtain such loans. But then it must be in a ratio of interest always increasing, in a ratio of amount obtained always decreasing; and when the economy, independently of the dignity of the Commonwealth, is taken into view, there can be no question of the necessity and advantage of taxation. You otherwise fall into the hands of brokers. You have not incurred that misfortune yet. But as your first interest was six per cent., your second seven and a half, or some fractional sum between seven and eight, I do not know exactly what, nor is it material—so your next must be ten, after that twenty, or some such exorbitant remuneration, and so on until the interest almost equals the principal. That a system of loans, therefore, is a bad system, without a corresponding arrangement of taxes, is not to be disputed.

The science of political economy is of very modern date. It is even younger, and much less practically understood, than that of chemistry. When it is recollected that the most authoritative treatise we have had on this subject—the work of Adam Smith—did not appear longer ago than the first year of the American Revolution, and that until that time the science was very little known, even in Europe, it should not be matter of surprise that so much less is its knowledge disseminated in this country; where, though the materials for taxation are very abundant, such a variety of difficulties exists to oppose and prevent its collection. Since Smith wrote, a host of writers—Stewart, my Lord Lauderdale, Say, and Ganill, with many more, have appeared for our instruction. But after a laborious consultation of all the theories I could find, I am constrained to acknowledge that these doctors disagree so much among themselves, as to defy the adoption of any one system from all their commentaries. They are like the members of this House. Each one has his own favorite fund of finance, and each one combats all the rest with ability. I am perfectly satisfied—and that is perhaps the only satisfactory result I have derived from the examination—that as writers do not, any two of them, coincide in the principles, it will be found impossible for us to agree in the details. We shall have as many schemes as members. If each one insists on his own project, at least one hundred and sixty will be moved; and instead of concurring with the committee in any general and distributed establishment, we shall, if each man be pertinacious to his own, adhere to so many incongruous and impracticable suggestions, as completely to defeat the object of the session. I do not myself approve the system reported by the Committee of Ways and Means. I think it a very bad one. Nothing but an emergency should induce me to support it. But abundant reflection has served to convince me that we must accede to such a plan as proceeds from the concentrated good sense and feelings of the House, or abandon all idea of any one at all.

While the treatises on political economy, to which I have referred, were coming to light in Europe, taxes were successively enacted, as necessity dictated their imposition, without any regard to the principles laid down for the government of financiers and legislators. The poor were taxed by the rich, who seemed to account it tax enough on themselves to be at the trouble to devise taxes for their inferiors. Systems were gradually built up in a perverse progress, beginning where they ought to end, and ending where they ought to have begun. Capital was taxed first, and income reserved to the last; although it must be obvious to every understanding, that income should be taxed first, and, if ever touched at any rate, capital reserved for the last—for the same reason that it is better economy to live on the interest of our money, rather than touch upon the principal. The ancient hearth tax, house tax, window tax, the excises, all preceded the heavier but juster burdens which latter years have introduced. Indeed it is not a century since, hoarding specie was the chief mean of the wealth of nations. The father of the great Frederick of Prussia, Frederick the Corporal, as he was called, by constantly hoarding up money, was enabled to leave his son eighty millions, with eighty thousand soldiers, which, with a disposition to be busy, prompted the great Frederick, as he has himself declared, to attempt those conquests which he annexed to his dominions; and which have since been wrested from his successors, who, without either the pecuniary or intellectual resources of the founder of the Prussian Kingdom, have been finally reduced to insignificance; for whoever succeeds in the present conflict no doubt the King of Prussia will not be Vicar of Bray. The success of either party will be destruction to him. The Turks, if I am not misinformed of their financial regulations, by a fundamental law of the Empire, oblige every Sultan to lay up a certain amount of the exactions he levies on his people, to meet the contingencies that may occur.

All the novelty and inherent difficulties of finance are aggravated, when we come to apply the principles in America, where the extent and diversity of our various States, their sovereignty, their dissimilar resources for revenue, and the very circumspection indeed of the language of the Federal Constitution in this particular, are so many fresh difficulties to be superadded to such as before existed. The subject teems with perplexities, turn as you will. The resolutions I have submitted appear to me to contain the best plan that I am aware of. But so sensible am I of the inexpediency of infesting the House with different propositions, to the prejudice of the system reported by the committee—which can be amended in process of time whenever it proves disadvantageous—that I should not have moved my resolutions, but for the purpose of throwing them in with those of the honorable gentleman from New York. I have no doubt that, after floundering about for some time in our projects, we shall at last all feel the necessity of subscribing to the system reported by the Committee of Ways and Means.

Having thus, at more length than I fear the Committee can excuse, treated the preliminary matters I thought I might be allowed to incorporate with this tiresome inquiry, I now proceed to exhibit a view, first of what has been done in this country in this department of Government; and secondly, of what is to be done or ought to be.

A retrospect of the annals of the Revolution, as far as respects taxes, will afford very little to interest or instruct us. There was at that period no metallic fund, or very little; no system either monetary or fiscal—paper was the sole resource, and that very soon fell before the ravages of depreciation. At the end of the year 1776—a year of reverses and despondency, as you know much better than I do, Mr. Chairman, for you have experience of events which I am obliged to learn from books or tradition—the depreciation was already at forty per cent. A captain's pay would not keep him in shoes, nor a major general's support an express rider. The first instalment of the first emission was procrastinated till 1779. And the taxes paid into the Treasury during fifteen months from the 1st November, 1784, to the 1st January, 1786, amounted to no more than $482,997. It is said to be a position warranted by the history of mankind, that, in the usual progress of things, the necessities of a nation in every stage of its existence will be found at least equal to its resources; to which position the financial history of our Revolution authorizes our adding another, that a generous people inhabiting a fine country will always find means equal to the pecuniary exigencies they may have to encounter. During the Revolution, in a much greater degree than now, there was always some apparently tremendous wave ahead which looked at a distance as if it must infallibly overwhelm the vessel—but as the bark proceeded the danger diminished, and it floated at last over every wave, till arrived safe into the haven of peace and prosperity.

The second era I shall notice elapsed from 1790 to 1802. Upon the adoption of the present Constitution it was an early object to lay and build up a system of taxation. The people were just then beginning to recover from the effects of a long war, just beginning to gather the first fruits of tranquillity and good government, when, poor in purse, though exuberant enough in spirit, the interior in particular, which now abounds with precious metals, being almost destitute of a metallic medium, an odious and unpopular excise was intruded into their hamlets. At the session of 1790-91, the Secretary of the Treasury laid before Congress what the present Chief Justice in the fifth volume of his Life of General Washington calls "an able and well digested argument," in the shape of a report, recommending, as the first step in the system, as the inauguration of taxes, a duty on domestic distilled spirits, to be collected in the mode now proposed in the resolution. I cannot help considering it a hasty and ill-advised resolution of the honorable gentleman from New York.

I have always been taught to believe—I understood so this very morning from a gentleman whose authority there is every reason to respect—that the Constitution contemplated a countervailing arrangement of taxes; not the imposition of all on any one article of production or quarter of the country. When, therefore, after what we know to be the Constitutional contemplation, and after all the dear-bought experience we have had on this subject, an honorable gentleman moves us to lay the whole burden on one article, which will bear heavily on one quarter, and endeavors to save his own province of the country from its due share, I cannot conceal my surprise or regret that so unfair and partial a scheme should be attempted. Sir, I understood the honorable gentleman from New York to say distinctly that the land tax would be severely felt in his quarter, and the whiskey tax very little, for which reason he is desirous of raising two millions from the latter and substituting it for the former. After many days painful and successful legislation, when we have at length arrived at something like a final understanding on the land tax assessment bill, an honorable gentleman on this side of the House throws us all into confusion by an effort to undo the work we have accomplished—for what? to overburden the agricultural districts with the payment of one-third of the sum total to be raised in one item, without any measures taken to alleviate their share of the remaining items of taxation. Such a course, I must say, I was not prepared to expect from the honorable gentleman who moved the resolution of yesterday. Sir, there is no objection, that I know of, to a whiskey tax. But it will be objected, and seriously too, that all the tax should not be laid on whiskey, a beverage of the poorer people, and of the agricultural States and districts; more especially when it is avowed that this unfair and unjust burden is to be substituted for a land tax, which will fall equally on all real property, and all sections of the country.

The motives to the original introduction of this unfortunate commencement of a system of internal revenue, were, I presume, three, in the mind of the first Secretary of the Treasury; in my humble apprehension all equally erroneous.

1. The probable productiveness of such a tax. Adam Smith says these excises produced in England, for the year ending the 5th July, 1775, the sum of £3,341,837. And I perceive by the budget of the English finances for 1812—a very interesting compilation, for which I am indebted to a gentleman whom I do not now see in his place, but who was formerly chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means—that all the English excises (I do not know what is included in all of them) produced during that year the prodigious sum of about twenty-seven millions sterling; to wit: ordinary, £20,899,406, and extraordinary £6,593,132.

2. The supposed morality of such a tax.

3. It was computed, together with the duties on imported spirits, to yield $877,000; just enough to pay the interest on the funded debt, which you know, Mr. Chairman, was a Treasury favorite of that day.

One historical consideration will answer all these motives to such an excise. It is true that subsequently, though I am not sure whether in precisely the same form, excises were introduced into England and have been found immensely lucrative. But so lately as 1734, in the time of Sir Robert Walpole, when that Minister was in the full culmination of place and power, an attempt to legislate excises on spirits and gin was completely defeated by the clamors and resistance of the people out of doors, and the arguments of Pulteney, Windham, Shippen, and the rest of the opposition in Parliament.

Sir Joseph Jekyll, who, I think, was master of the rolls, and moved the gin act, indulged himself on that occasion in many reflections on the morality of such taxes. But his moral results were completely reasoned down by those who took the opposite side. I do not know, for my part, what morality and taxation have to do together. Legislation, to be sure, should always look to the morals of the community; and taxation is a branch of legislation. But I have no idea that we either should or can administer to their morality under the disguise of taxes. When we moralize, let us moralize—when we tax, let us tax. I cannot indeed subscribe altogether to Mr. Burke's eloquent defence of gin, who in his "Thoughts on Scarcity" expresses himself to this effect: "As to what is said, in a physical and moral view, against the home-consumption of spirits, experience has long since taught me very little, to respect the declamations on that subject—whether the thunder of the laws or the thunder of eloquence 'is hurled on gin,' always I am thunder proof. The alembic, in my mind, has furnished the world a far greater benefit and blessing, than if the opus maximum had been really found by chemistry, and, like Midas, we could turn every thing into gold."

But I have no hesitation in saying, that no excise on the drink of the laboring classes will be fair, unless by the same sort of burdens you raise the price of Madeira and Claret, and Burgundy and Port, to at least one thousand dollars a pipe, and affect yourselves—it would not trouble me much, though it might many gentlemen—with as great an advancement on the price of their liquors, together with as odious a domiciliary interruption and superintendence, as an excise on whiskey will prove to other people. I do not say this—I need not, with any view to popularity in Pennsylvania. I have spoken my sentiments freely on the one side; and I may be believed, I trust, when I profess them with the same freedom on the other. Everybody must know that there is not a district in America, which would feel such a tax less than mine. Pennsylvania has no objection to being taxed, in her full proportion. I despise a popularity to be gained by advocating an exemption from taxes. But we are not to be imposed upon neither. Give us the duty upon the capacity, as the committee have reported, instead of the gallon as proposed by this resolution, and there will be no complaint. The unhappy consequences of the excise system have been sufficiently exemplified. Gentlemen see what it did in England, when first attempted there. They recollect its operation in this country in 1794 and 1798. They have witnessed the more recent operation very lately of a similar principle in the effects of the Enforcing Act, as it was called, to the Embargo—when a violent and invincible resistance to the intrusion of revenue officers into private habitations—every man's house being his castle, and not to be violated—coerced the repeal of those commercial restrictions on ourselves, which led so soon afterwards to the alternative of war with our enemies. The introduction of an excise on domestic spirits, as the commencement of a system of taxation, was certainly unlucky, if not unwise. Such a tax ought to be blended with others. The whole plan should be a countervailing one, as I have already observed. No class, no section, no article must feel itself saddled with the whole; and in addition to that difficulty, drawn from the nature of the dominions of the United States, an excise, at all events, should be avoided, if the product desired can be got at through any other medium.

What is an excise? The hottest essay of the day, at the time of the beginning of the American Revolution, was written by Dr. Johnson, to prove "Taxation no Tyranny." Yet even Dr. Johnson defines an excise "a hateful tax levied on commodities, and adjudged, not by the common judges of property, but by wretches hired by those to whom the excise is paid." The Doctor had in mind, perhaps, when he composed this definition in all the vehemence of his rhetoric—he had in mind, perhaps, the excise on tea, which is said to have been his favorite drink. But the sentiment is not on that account the less applicable to all excises; and among the rest that now endeavored to be interpolated instead of a fair collection of a duty on distilled liquors, by the capacity of the still, rather than by the gallon, which renders unnecessary an army of excisemen and superintendents.

Upon whom must this excise fall? Inquire of Adam Smith. He certainly was no Democrat; and had no view, in 1776, when he published his celebrated work, to popularity in Pennsylvania. In his third volume, at the 302d page, he thus expresses himself: "The excise upon the materials and manufacture of home-made, fermented, and spirituous liquors, is accordingly, of all the different taxes upon expenses, by far the most productive; and this branch of the excise falls very much, perhaps principally, upon the expense of the common people."

Was, then, this excise right formerly, and would it be justifiable now? Let us look into the Federalist for an answer. In the 36th number of that excellent disquisition, it is avowed to be "a fixed point of policy to go as far as may be practicable in making the luxury of the rich tributary to the public Treasury, in order to diminish the necessity of those impositions which might create dissatisfaction in the poorer and more numerous classes of society." Thus, fortified with the authority, the express authority, of the great man who was placed first at the head of the Treasury Department of this country, I need not, I am confident, spend more time upon a point which he has so clearly and ably exhibited.

Misled by delusive calculations of the great productiveness of such a tax, the Government was induced to begin with it alone. In the shape of an excise, it is objectionable absolutely. But in any shape it should be accompanied, whenever laid, with other taxes, to equalize the pressure on all classes, and throughout every detachment of the community. The southern and western, in other words, the agricultural parts of the United States, opposed its enactment; and proposed, as substitutes for it, taxes on salaries, pensions, lawyers, newspapers, and a direct land tax; for, it must always be remembered, that the minority, at the time I refer to, now the majority, uniformly proposed and maintained the direct land tax as the most simple, the most republican, and in all respects the most efficacious and unobjectionable. The excise on whiskey, nevertheless, passed the House of Representatives by a majority of thirty-five to twenty-one.

Hopes were indulged that it would prove less intolerable in its operation than had been predicted; but in his speech, at the opening of the second Congress, General Washington acknowledges the existence of some discontents. In May, 1792, this tax was so modified as to remove or soften some of its harshest features. But unhappily the evil had then taken root, and the people unlawfully undertook its deracination. In the meanwhile all taxes were becoming unpopular, because of the odious effects of that one, which was first attempted to be levied alone. Of the insurrections in Pennsylvania I do not know that it is necessary I should take any other notice, than to express my regret, as I do most heartily, and with equal sincerity, at those distressing commotions and their impolitic causes.

On the 5th June, 1794, the President signed the act for taxing licenses to retail wine and liquor sellers; which was too much like a corollary to be palatable then, of the pestilence of the whiskey tax. And on the same day another excise, to wit, on snuff, tobacco, and refined sugar. On the 28th of May, 1796, the President's signature was affixed to a carriage tax; repealing one of a similar complexion passed at the first session of the fourth Congress. These are all the taxes enacted during General Washington's Administration, consisting of—1. The excise on Whiskey; 2. The License tax; 3. The excise on Snuff, Tobacco, and Refined Sugar; 4. The Carriage tax. A direct land tax and a stamp tax had both been proposed, but were negatived; the former by a large majority. The remaining taxes passed during the Administration of Mr. Adams. On the 6th July, 1797, he signed the Stamp Act. On the 9th July, 1798, at the first session of the fifth Congress, the law was passed for valuing lands and dwelling-houses, and enumerating slaves; and a few days after, on the 14th of July, 1798, the law for collecting a direct land tax of two millions. On the 28th of February, 1799, an act passed making alterations in the Stamp Act. On the 23d of April, 1800, an act for the establishment of a general stamp office. On the 24th of April, 1800, a modification or abrogation of the excise on snuff. On the 25th of February, 1801, an act rendering perpetual the acts for taxing spirituous liquors, tobacco, and refined sugar, licenses, auctions, and carriages. Soon after this period, Mr. Adams's Administration was superseded by Mr. Jefferson's. On the 6th of March, 1802, the direct land tax was modified; and on the 6th of April, 1802, all the internal duties were repealed. The Committee of Ways and Means at that time, who reported for this repeal, estimating the net annual income, clear of losses and expenses, at but six hundred thousand dollars.

This tedious process has carried me through the era of our former taxation, and brought me now to inquire what taxes are to be at present adopted. The Committee of Ways and Means have recommended, as the principal resource, a direct land tax. After we had been engaged for a week and more on the laborious details of this tax, and had arrived, as I flattered myself, very near their termination, most unexpectedly an objection to the whole is stated by the honorable gentleman from New York, who wishes, first, to substitute a whiskey tax to the amount of two millions in the place of the land tax, which he proposes to relinquish altogether; and, secondly, his plan is to convert the whiskey tax from a collection on the capacity, as the committee have reported it, to an excise on the gallon. As to the substitution of the one tax for the other, I am averse to such a change for a variety of reasons. All direct taxes are preferable to indirect taxes, in a republican country; and accordingly, in all the debates on this subject, in 1791, '2, '3, '4, '5, '6, '7, '8, and '9, the republican and agricultural representation in Congress expressed their predilection for such a tax. I do not pretend to be intimate with its details, nor competent to decide on the expediency of one establishment in preference to another. I am not yet perfectly aware of the merits of the controversy involved in the modification introduced by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. MONTGOMERY,) and voted against that modification, not because I clearly saw that the plan proposed by the committee was preferable in its assessments—for on that point I have not formed a judgment—but because I am convinced that the optional subsequent arrangement should be left with the respective States, as proposed by the committee, and controverted by the honorable gentleman from Kentucky. On that point I have a decided opinion. The Federalist, in the 36th and 45th numbers, explicitly asserts the position now taken by the committee; which convinces me that such a method of taxation was contemplated at the moment of the adoption of the Constitution; and I am equally clear of its expediency.

A land tax is the principal item of taxation, I believe, in all countries where the agricultural interest predominates. Peuchet, a late French statist, gives the income of France, for 1804, at 634,000,000 of francs; which is about 34,200,000 pounds sterling. Of this sum no less than 206,908,000 proceed from the direct land tax. In England the land tax and assessed taxes afford but 7,399,000 out of an income of 71,000,000, exclusively of loans for the year 1812. So that the land tax in France amounts to nearly one-third of the whole national income, and to but a tenth in England.

The other taxes reported by the committee are mostly the same with those formerly in operation; but altered in their principles of distribution and collection, according to the amendments which experience and time have dictated.

In the tax proposed on pleasure carriages, it appears to me—and at a proper stage of the proceeding I intend to submit an amendment to that effect—that by the substitution of pleasure houses for pleasure carriages, we shall equalize the taxation and increase the product. The former carriage tax fell in very unequal burdens on Massachusetts and Virginia; and I should suppose that such a tax would now prove more unequal than it even was before. But by laying it on pleasure houses instead of pleasure carriages, or on pleasure houses as well as pleasure carriages, the imposition would be equalized.

The sources of income contemplated in the resolutions I have laid on the table, are brought into view, not so much for the purpose of pressing them forward at this session, as in order to show that there probably are as many projects in imagination as there are members in their seats: and if indeed the honorable gentleman from New York persists in his scheme, contrary to the report of the committee, I do not know why every other theorist may not be indulged in the prosecution of his, too. The result of it all will be, I have no doubt—I am certain from reflection and observation on the course of our business—that after floundering for a fortnight, at this intemperate season, through a mire of schemes, we shall at last return, nothing the wiser or nearer our respective objects, to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means. At another session there will be abundant opportunity for the alteration of such taxes as may be enacted at this, and the introduction of such additional taxes as may be devised.

I am myself attached to a system of income taxes. All economists agree that taxes are preferable which bear on income, to taxes which bear on principal, as I have before intimated. The tax on successions would be a fair and a profitable one, and easy of collection. I would provide for it, as is done in England, by a clause or two in the stamp act, declaring that receipts to executors and administrators should not be valid unless stamped with a particular kind of stamp, together with other securities for the attainment of the tax. The public would thus be, in fact, the heir of every decedent; and his heirs or devisees would be obliged to pay but a small discount on the receipt of their successions. This is a tax as old as the age of Augustus Cæsar, and in operation, I believe, in most of the countries of modern Europe.

The tax on law suits I would arrange also by a clause or more in the stamp act, declaring that, on the institution of any suit for a demand exceeding $100, the party plaintiff or complainant should be obliged to pay down a certain sum, say never less than one dollar nor more than five, which should abide the event of the action, like other costs. If the plaintiff succeeded, the advance should be refunded to him by taxing it on the defendant. If the defendant succeeded, the plaintiff should not have it back again. I cannot speak with any precision of the number of suits brought in any other jurisdiction than that of the several courts of Philadelphia. I compute there about 3,500 a year. Taking, therefore, our population in that district, and this number of suits, and calculating the product on the whole United States at the same rate, and I make an annual income which might amount to $300,000, from this item of internal revenue.

But the best of all taxes, in my opinion, is an income tax. It is true it was reserved for one of the last struggles of finance in England, where it did not appear until the time of the late Mr. Pitt. But it affords, as appears by the British budget for 1812, upwards of thirteen millions sterling a year; and must be, of all taxes, the most just, because it is nothing more than a deduction from superfluity and wealth, to be bestowed in the public service. It is perhaps true, that very serious difficulties would occur in its collection. But I do not think it would be found indispensable to put every citizen to his oath as to the amount of his income. The amount might be assessed according to his visible or ostensible property, as I believe is the case with other rates in Philadelphia, leaving to the party a right of appeal in all cases of grievance, but fixing him with the burden of disproving what he had been rated at.

Nothing now remains to be considered but the mode of collection—an article of the utmost delicacy and importance. It is collection with all its domiciliary visits and examinations, that disgusts people more than the amount of their contributions. The grand aim is to combine as much as can be done—1. Equality of operation; 2. Abundance of product; and 3. Simplicity of collection. The first, in this country, is unattainable. The most you can do is to countervail tax against tax, so as to create a sort of equilibrium throughout the respective States. The second, abundance of product, may be secured, provided the nicest adjustment take place of the third, simplicity of collection.

Collection in the United States must needs contend with uncommon difficulties. In England it is said to cost five per cent., in France sixteen. Where a land tax constitutes a principal item, the expenses of collection will naturally be greater than where the sources of revenue lie in other quarters. And in England, where so large a proportion of their population inhabits the single city of London, and so much more of its other considerable towns, taxes may be collected with greater facility and less expense than in countries differently situated as to their interior distribution. But I do not believe that the expense of collection in France is so great as sixteen per cent. This assertion comes from Sir Francis D'Ivernois; who, though he has a foreign name, is nevertheless an English writer; and, therefore, his statements of French finance are to be received with some grains of allowance.

In the debate on Mr. MONTGOMERY's proposition, I have already expressed my approbation of that part of the plan of the Committee of Ways and Means, which proposes to leave the interior arrangement of the land tax to the State authorities. The Federalist, which, as a contemporaneous work with the Constitution, I refer to as high authority in these particulars, will be found, in the 36th and 45th numbers, marking out precisely the course now recommended to be followed.

1. In reserving taxes for an emergency, for a supplemental revenue.
2. In leaving the option with the States of paying in advance and collecting for themselves.
3. In the mode of collection, employment of State officers, and conforming to their previous proceedings.

I do not consider the amount to be collected the first year or so a point of very great moment. There is plenty of money in the country at the public service. Pledge the public faith, by taxation, for the faithful redemption of the national debts by means of permanent resources, and I dare to say you may have as much money as will be required by loan at moderate interest. It is the principle that is to be established. It is the pledge that is to be given. Care indeed should rather be taken not to call forth too much at first. The system is to be initiated, to be inaugurated—when once fairly in process, the product may be gradually increased to almost any amount.

Sir, coming here, as I do, the idea of apprehension at a plan of internal revenue, is absurd, preposterous, chimerical. The great, opulent, and exemplary district, which I have the honor in part to represent, second to none in resources and inclination for them; the district composed of the city and county of Philadelphia sends me here, unworthy as I am, on the broad basis of a majority, large enough to turn the counterpoise in two of those States, which, voting by a general State ticket, are represented on this floor, by no less than eight honorable gentlemen, together with four honorable colleagues in the other House. The great, central, and sterling State, of which I am a native and to the manor born, has associated me with one-and-twenty colleagues, fairly chosen in their respective neighborhoods, without carving or lumping, the lineal offspring of the purest exercise of the right of suffrage, and elected by an aggregate majority, which, if it could be applied to such a purpose, would be sufficient to rectify the polls in all the doubtful States of the Union. Thus supported, what have we to apprehend from the enactment of those taxes we are pledged to vote for, and concerning which I have no other apprehension than that a general incongruity and irreconcilableness of local prepossessions may delay them for the present session? I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I shall go home in triumph if the taxes pass, but in shame and mortification, and fear to look my constituents in their faces, if they do not—if by any accident or difficulty they should be prevented or impeded. I am full of well-grounded hopes that, on this momentous occasion, the State of Pennsylvania will give a unanimous vote for the country. In our prosperous community we have neither commerce run mad, nor agriculture in extremes, nor manufactures out of order; but commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, all happily blended together in just proportions, and reciprocally accessory to each other's advancement and prosperity. We have a secret there for the security and permanence of political rectitude and consistency, which I beg leave to recommend to the consideration and adoption of my friends from Virginia and New York. They shall have it for nothing, and will find it inestimable. It is universality of suffrage; it is the practical commentary on the rubric of the Constitution—"We, the people of these United States."

I cannot help thinking the motion now before us, submitted by the honorable gentleman from New York, (Mr. Fisk,) a hasty and ill-advised endeavor to exempt his own portion of the Union by double and treble loading other portions—a mode of proceeding of which I cannot approve, and to which I will not accede. Lay on your taxes fairly, and we will contribute our quotas to them all from Pennsylvania without a murmur, and in any quantity required, according to our population.

An honorable gentleman of this House, before I had a seat here, declared us wanting in influence, for a reason which I will not repeat—I am sure it was urged only because founded in mistake, and I do not allude to it with any design of recrimination—that honorable gentleman will permit me to assure him that we are now ambitious of putting at least our patriotism to the test in any way this critical subject may require; and as far as influence is to be proved or merited in the heaviest vote for taxes, we shall not shrink from an emulation with his State, or any other. Sir, comparisons are said to be odious in social life, and certainly they are so in political society, like ours, composed of eighteen independent sovereignties. But as the former war with England was said to be the time which tried men's souls, so is this the crisis when men's votes are to be put to the test. Let us see if, at a dead lift for the country the caput mortuum of Pennsylvania will not be distinguished above other peers of the realm. We are ready, and anxious, to take our full share of all the burdens. I put it to the candor and good sense of the gentlemen without exception, on this side of the House, to reflect whether the ends of the present session, productive taxes for the support of a prosperous war, are likely to be attained by accumulating burdens on any particular provinces of the country, to their prejudice and the unfair exclusion of others. As to this excise, everybody must know that my more immediate district would feel it as little as any one on the continent. But I am not the less, on that account, impressed with its radical and enormous inequality, injustice, and inexpediency, if taken, as submitted, as a substitute for the land tax. Sir, there are no terrors in taxes now to the State of Pennsylvania. We have been used to serving without reward; and I hope, decidedly as I am opposed to the proposed substitute, that we could be reconciled even to that, for the emergency, if a majority of this House should resolve to lay it on us.

We have contributed not less than three or four thousand recruits to your armies, within the last year, without the compliment of one single general officer. We advanced, I think, about three millions to the loan of 1812, and about eight millions to the loan of 1813, together with a surplus of one million, voted by the State for the support of public credit, and the Federal cause. We have been accustomed too long to an undue weight of the burden of State, without either soliciting, or receiving unsolicited, a corresponding allotment of the current public patronage, to set ourselves about repining at this time of day over any act of injustice that may be inflicted on us. For myself, I can only say that, if, after doing my utmost to prevent the enactment of an unequal system of internal revenue, I should fail in that endeavor, it shall then be my next to strive at least to reconcile my own mind, and the minds of my constituents, to its operation. This is no time for cavils; and rather than endure any longer the insufferable injustice of our enemies abroad, it is much better to submit cheerfully to the more tolerable injustice of our friends at home.

Taxation is the last experiment of Republicanism. I do not use that term as a partisan, but in its general acceptation. If we can tax, Republicanism endures forever; if not, it is high time to be done with it. Without the power of waging war, Government is useless; and war cannot be waged without finances. Anxious for the result of this final experiment, I confess I am. But, at the same time, confident that its success will be transcendent. The gentlemen on the other side of the House supposed, for a long time, that the present Administration could not be driven into a war. Those gentlemen were mistaken. They deceived themselves. Since the declaration of war, they suppose that we are too apprehensive of the effects of taxes, to lay them on. Here, again, they will find their error. And, at all events, be the issue what it may to me, as an individual, I am cheered and sustained, and impelled forward by the reflection that, to the country at large, it must be advantage and prosperity. Let us put it to the trial without delay; and if it will not be taxed, it is, I repeat, high time that we should know it.

Mr. FISK spoke a few words in explanation; and concluded by moving that the Committee rise; which motion was agreed to, and the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, June 30.

Mr. WHEATON presented an address from the religious Society of Friends, in New England, (commonly called Quakers,) met in their annual assembly in Rhode Island, requesting "that no opportunity may be omitted of sheathing the sword, even during the pending negotiations, and of restoring to our nation the blessings of peace."—Read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported a bill making a further appropriation for fortifying the ports and harbors of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, reported a bill to amend and explain the act regulating pensions to persons on board of private armed ships; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The question, whether the Committee of the whole House have leave to sit again on Mr. FISK's resolution for laying an excise on domestic distilled spirits, was taken up and decided in the affirmative—yeas 63, nays 48.

And the further consideration of the same was then postponed to Monday four weeks—yeas 63, nays 61.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bills for laying and collecting a direct tax.

The Committee proceeded to consider the bill for laying a tax on licenses for distilling.

Mr. BIBB read a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, explanatory of his reasons for recommending (in answer to the inquiry of the Committee) that the tax be laid on the capacity of the stills in preference to quantity distilled.

Mr. BIBB moved to fill up the blanks in the several sections respecting the time when this bill shall be put into operation, with the words "first day of January next," which was agreed to without opposition.

Mr. TAYLOR, after a speech of considerable length, moved to strike out the whole of the 2d section of the bill, which lays a tax on the capacity of the still.

[A debate of considerable length took place on the motion, in which Messrs. BIBB, DUVAL, WRIGHT, FISK of New York, ROBERTS, FINDLEY, BOWEN, SHEPHERD, and PICKENS, successively spoke.]

Mr. DUVAL.—Mr. Chairman, I rise with reluctance to address you on this subject. But the interests of the nation, and particularly the Western States, are deeply concerned in the subject now under consideration. Sir, I was opposed to the amendment offered to this bill by a gentleman from New York, (Mr. FISK,) on yesterday, changing its principle by laying an excise duty of nine or twelve cents on each gallon of domestic distilled spirits; and the proposition now made by another honorable member from the same State, (Mr. TAYLOR,) to strike out the first and second sections of this bill, is made with the avowed intention of laying an excise duty on the gallon; it is the same proposition, made only in another manner. I fear, sir, if this motion should prevail, the first and second sections of this bill be lost, and its principle entirely changed, its final passage will be rendered doubtful. I ask but the attention of this Committee for a short time to prove to their satisfaction that the motion to strike out ought not to prevail. To do this, I shall not exhaust your patience by a learned display of ancient and modern history, or by a recitation of the fiscal systems of Great Britain and France. For the honorable member from Pennsylvania (Mr. INGERSOLL) has taken a wide and learned view of all these subjects. I shall account myself fortunate if I can come to the point in controversy, and mix up a little common sense in the opinions I shall advance. I admire the book learning that has been displayed by several gentlemen on this subject; but let me assure you that common sense and practical knowledge of the operation of this tax, are worth all the learned theories and disquisitions which we can have on this subject. I ask who are to pay the tax on stills? The people of the Western country, who have already sustained the weight of the war. The people of the Western country, are they to do all the fighting, and to pay all the taxes? Will the people of the South, East, and a great portion of the North pay this tax? No. It will be paid by the Western people, men without capitals, farmers, whose distance from the seaboard compels them to distil the product of their farms, in order to take it to distant markets in the only shape that can reward them for their labors. The tax, as proposed in the bill reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, is one dollar and eight cents per gallon on the capacity of each still. I fear that this will be more than our farmers can pay; men who are obliged daily to labor on their farms for the support of their families, cannot command the money that will be required to pay the tax on their stills. A license on a still of the capacity of one hundred and fifty gallons, for one year, will amount to one hundred and sixty-two dollars, which not one farmer in two hundred can advance. The certain consequence, then, will be to prevent all who are owners of stills (and who cannot command the amount of duty) from distilling at all. The revenue, contemplated even under the bill as it now stands, will fall far short, I fear, of the calculations already submitted, which is seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars. The tax is now too high. It will not yield as much revenue as can be raised by lessening the duty, for if the duty was seventy-five cents per gallon upon the capacity of the still, I assert that three stills would be in operation under the duty, when not more than one in five will be employed under the regulations which are now submitted by the bill as reported. But change the principle of this bill, and lay an excise of nine or twelve cents on each gallon of domestic spirits distilled, and I venture to predict, that the revenue from this source will be but an illusion. Men in moderate circumstances, and such constitute the large body of the people in the Western States, will be completely debarred of the use of their stills, and the Government defeated of its revenue by an avaricious and over-calculating spirit. The thousands that this tax has been calculated to produce will vanish like a morning dream. If it is our serious business to raise money for the war, let me ask if it is wise or prudent to lay such a weight on one article, when it is evident that, if overstrained, it will sink at once with all our prospects, all our hopes of revenue? I was surprised when I heard the gentleman from New York (Mr. Fisk) gravely tell you, that the whole revenue now wanted by the Government, ought to, and could, be raised by an excise on distilled spirits. But, surprise was changed to astonishment when that gentleman said a revenue of twenty-five millions of dollars could be raised in the way proposed, and that he would vote for the raising of that sum if necessary. Yes, sir, I have no doubt that that gentleman and many others will vote for laying an extravagant excise on distilled spirits, because they hope by doing so to avoid (what they view with trembling apprehension) a direct tax; their own constituents will not then feel the weight of the taxes, and if this motion shall prevail, it will exempt them from the burden of the Government. This course of legislation is, I suppose, what some gentlemen call patriotic—supporting the war with vigor by shuffling the burdens of it from their own on the shoulders of others. If so, let them boast of their virtue and patriotism in voting for the only tax that cannot reach their constituents. Such refined patriotism does not belong to the Western people. I, sir, shall vote for the bill as reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, not because I think it equal, but because the situation of this nation demands that we raise a revenue; because, if this law laying a duty on stills does not pass, no other tax bill will get through this House. The tax on stills has never been popular in my State, and I do not expect it will be approved of by every person in my district. The great body of the people of the Western States will, however, submit with cheerfulness, as they know the necessity that requires them to contribute to the National Treasury, is of first importance to the Union. I know that gentlemen in the Opposition have said publicly that the people will not submit to be taxed, because they objected to taxes under Mr. Adams's Administration. Sir, I will not stop, for a moment, to point out the difference; it is too obvious to need any explanation.

Let me, before I leave this subject of taxation, say something more about the twenty-five millions of dollars, which the gentleman from New York (Mr. Fisk) has asserted can be raised by an excise on distilled spirits. Is there one man of common sense in this House, or in the nation, who can seriously believe this mighty sum can be thus obtained? Surely, sir, that honorable member must have been lately reading some extravagant fairy tale; perhaps Aladdin and his wonderful Lamp has engaged the gentleman's fancy, and has led his imagination captive through hills of gold and valleys of diamonds; or, perchance, he has been dreaming of the philosopher's stone, whose magic touch changes everything to gold; for how else can we account for this unconfined and extravagant calculation? Sir, there is only one other way. I know that some members who voted for this war will vote for any sum to give it continuance and effect, provided their constituents have none of it to pay. Taxation will endanger their popularity; the very idea of taxing their constituents is appalling; already they feel their seats trembling under them, and another election may tumble them from their elevation. Many who voted for the war did not believe it would last three months; for the people of England had become restive under the operation of the embargo and other restrictive systems, and many politicians believed that, as soon as the declaration of war was known in England, the people of that country would rise en masse, change their Ministry, and demand a peace. How differently things have happened need not be told here. These gentlemen have been disappointed; they have pledged themselves to support this war, and are afraid to vote for the taxes. If they could only appear consistent in the eyes of the nation, it would be no subject of serious regret with them if the tax bills should fail altogether.

I have heard (though I am not conversant in legislative proceedings) of such a thing as killing a bill with kindness; or, in other words, by heaping so many amendments on it (all for its good, no doubt) as to effectually destroy its existence. If this motion or amendment should be acceded to, such will be the fate of the present bill; and if this bill is defeated, those gentlemen who are looking with anxiety for an opportunity to bolt, will then have a fine excuse to defeat the whole contemplated revenue, because the bill laying a duty on stills did not pass. Thus, in the appearance of raising an ample revenue for the necessities of the nation, those gentlemen are taking the most effectual steps to prevent all taxation. The bills now before us were reported and agreed to during the last session of Congress. Why were the taxes not then brought into operation? Because the very men who voted for the war could not be brought to act with unity; they believed the war would be only in name and not in fact, or surely they would have provided the means of prosecuting it with vigor.

The motion to strike out the first and second sections of this bill would not be made at this late day, but for the purpose of defeating the bill, and thereby destroying the whole system of revenue. More than six weeks have elapsed since we have been consulting here, and nothing of consequence have we yet done, and nothing shall we do, unless we lay aside our local prejudices, think ourselves what we are, the Representatives of the Union, and, as such, act with decision and independence. No one honorable member can hope, in the various bills, to get them all so framed as to meet his individual interest, or that of his constituents. We had, then, better adhere to the report of the Committee of Ways and Means; unless we do so, there can be no general good resulting to the nation, for none can be hoped for from the trimming policy heretofore pursued. Let gentlemen reflect—the eyes of the nation are turned on them in anxious expectation—that much is expected from them. But if they do not mean to meet the expectations and wishes of the people; if they do not mean to vote for the taxes, I call upon them to come out openly and fairly, and not work behind the scenes, but declare their opposition; the forces can then be counted on each side of the House; and if we are too weak to pass the bills for the raising of revenue, we can, at least, save some expense to the nation by going home.

You cannot complain that the Federal gentlemen have impeded you in this business of taxation; they have told you that they will not vote for taxes, because they were opposed to the war; but they throw no obstacles in your way. You are the majority, and can raise any revenue in spite of all opposition, if you have independence enough to act with unity, like men. Who can you blame, then, but yourselves for this shuffling delay and indecision? This is not the time to talk of the justice or necessity of the war; that you should have thought of sooner. When it was declared, you said it was not only just, but absolutely necessary; and you have pledged yourselves to support the Administration in the means and aid it in the management of this war. You have called the sons of freedom to arms, and your call has been obeyed. Thousands have rallied around the national standard, and many of the brave have already fallen to support your opinions and their country's rights. For support, the warriors of the Union look to you as the collected virtue and wisdom of the nation. You must provide money for your soldiers; you must support and furnish them with the munitions of war. And can all this be done without taxation? Where are your millions? In your Treasury? No, sir. I believe the public coffers have an empty sound. To the magnanimity of the people you must surely look; call on them now for money, and, my life on it, they will not hesitate to meet your demands. As freemen, contending for their rights, the people will never withhold their money when the object to be attained is worth it. Who is there, then, that voted for this war, that will now hang back and refuse his assent to those taxes? Can the one be supported without the others? Shall he who was among the first to assist in raising the standard of war, in calling the nation to arms, be the first in the hour of peril and misfortune to desert his post and his principles? I trust, sir, for the honor of the country, none will act so miserably mean; so disgraceful to himself; so ruinous to the interest and credit of the nation. But if any man shall shrink from the high responsibility he has drawn on himself, I warn him of the fate he may expect; of the bitter anguish he shall feel; for woe shall light on him in the curses and execrations of his country; history shall mark his name with infamy; it shall descend as an example of disgrace to future generations; and it will be mercy in that Being who holds in his hand the destinies of nations, and who judges of the actions of men, if he does not more than damn the man who shall thus basely desert his country.

MR. SHIPHERD.—MR. Chairman: If I understand the motion of my honorable colleague, (MR. TAYLOR,) it is to strike out the second section of the bill before the Committee, with a view to move to enhance the several duties imposed therein. If so, I hope his motion may prevail; and, therefore, I rise to offer to the Committee a few remarks on the subject.

Sir, I wish to reserve to myself the right of an ultimate opinion, which now may not be formed, upon the propriety or impropriety of the passage of any of the tax bills reported by the Committee of Ways and Means, and, in the end, to vote against or for them, as my judgment shall then dictate. I shall now only urge the propriety, if we must have taxes, to make domestic distilled spirits bear its full proportion.

That this is more suitable than a direct tax, I have no doubt, and will operate more benignly upon the Union; and I think I can show that it will be vastly less injurious, and less oppressive than a land tax.

A direct tax is paid in by constraint; an indirect tax by choice. In the former case, it is the imperious, unrelenting mandate of the law, that draws forth, even from the meagre purse of poverty, its last pittance; while in the latter, it is wholly a matter of choice, which the consumer may regulate according to his necessity or prosperity. If the crops of the farmer are cut short, his cattle die, or if, in any way, he is unfortunate, he can, by the exercise of common prudence, relieve himself from the burden of this tax, by drinking no spirits, or he can drink less, and pay less. But, sir, with your land tax, there is no such alternative—crops may be blighted, cattle die, and yet the inexorable scowl of a collector pays the wretched unfortunate his annual visit—the hand of law draws forth the last cent of his hard earnings, and that, too, which may be indispensable for the common comforts of his family. Sir, this is too often a wretched source from which to draw a revenue, for, really, humanity shudders at the idea of burdening beyond endurance the honest but indigent man.

The Ways and Means.

It is said that the farmer who owns land must be able to pay the demands of the Government, having a proportionable fund in his hands. Sir, it is not a necessary consequence that a man has the ability to pay because he is in possession of real property. Firstly, because he may not own the land he occupies; and secondly, because, although he may have a legal title, it may be encumbered by a mortgage, to the last cent of its value.

I trust the Committee do not need to learn that, in many parts of the United States, the possessors of land have no interest in the soil but a naked possession. Driven by necessity, they obtain, and are only able to obtain this most miserable and precarious of all titles. Too poor to purchase, or to hire, they are constrained to drop themselves and families on some uncultivated spot, and by patient toil and perseverance have become enabled to subsist. If you levy a direct tax, from this source you will draw a considerable portion of your revenue.

Again, sir, much of the real property in some parts of the Union is leased to men of very slender means, and most generally does the landlord require in the lease, that his tenant shall pay the taxes. Whatever disasters, therefore, the tenant may experience, yet he must pay. He is burdened, the owner escapes. I make these remarks to show that you are not, in laying a direct tax, imposing it upon wealth, but, in too many cases, upon indigence, absolute poverty, and a poverty, too, which human foresight could not prevent; but one which may be brought on by sickness, or loss, or both.

The wisest object of all Government is, to tax the wealthy, and not the indigent; to tax the luxuries, and not the necessities of life.

It is a fact, not to be disputed, that a vast many of the hardy and enterprising emigrants who have ventured to plant themselves in the wilderness, and who have purchased their lands wholly on credit, have undergone almost every privation, have found much difficulty in saving what has cost them so much fatigue, for the want of funds to pay the interest; and, perhaps, the instalment of their purchase would be through men who would pay much of this tax; and to such a man, a tax, superadded to the ordinary taxes of the State, may become a burden not to be borne. It may be the ruin, and break down the spirit of an honest, industrious, and indispensable portion of the community.

In a tax of this nature you may expect to create much discontent, and you do so because you do not leave to the citizen the exercise of his volition; and I have always believed that it was an interesting and important object with lawgivers, so to frame their laws as they will tend to preserve a good understanding between the governors and the governed.

Yes, sir, preserve the affections of your citizens, and you have all you want. Once break that cord of affection, and you have nothing left. If this position is true, it requires no very accurate discernment to discover which is the true course, and a little knowledge of the disposition of men will evince the truth of this axiom: That, while men will suffer much when left to choice, they will endure but little without murmuring, when constrained by power so to submit.

Sir, if you make domestic distilled spirits the object of taxation, it must be seen, that if any part of the tax is paid, it is a voluntary payment. It is therefore not felt or complained of, being paid only by the man who chooses to be taxed. If he considers this commodity convenient or agreeable to him, he purchases it with its encumbrance, he knows what he buys, and is left at liberty to buy or not to buy—no reasonable man can or will complain.

But, sir, there are other considerations which operate strongly on my mind in favor of the motion of my honorable colleague; and, before I proceed to mention them, I beg leave to introduce to you an honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. INGERSOLL) whom I see in his place; and I am the more induced to do it seasonably, from a strong sense of justice to that gentleman, who travelled so far out of his way, in his speech of yesterday, to visit me. I say he travelled out of his way; for I well know I was not in his way—that I had no connexion, directly or indirectly, with the course he was running; and yet, sir, I well know he run so directly foul of me, had he not stumbled, he most unquestionably would have run over me.

The honorable gentleman began by telling the Committee that I had come forward in a speech, with religion in my heart, and politics in my head. As to the first, sir, I will only say, that I humbly hope I have religion in my heart, and if I have, I ought to thank with fervent gratitude that good Author of my being, who has bestowed upon me this precious gift; and I really wish that I could with sincerity reciprocate this charge with that gentleman (Mr. INGERSOLL.) Whether I can or not, I am yet to learn; and whether he has that religion or not in his heart, is a matter between his own soul and a God of Justice as well as Mercy, to whom he is responsible, and before whom he must hereafter appear and answer.

The gentleman next expressed his total ignorance of the district I represented. This ignorance I presume, sir, will not surprise the Committee; first, because I have led an obscure life, in comparison with some gentlemen; and secondly, because the Committee cannot suppose that the honorable gentleman, whose great mind plays with no less toys than great cities, like his own dear Philadelphia, kingdoms and empires, should know the obscure district which I represent. Why, sir, the honorable gentleman wields a Napoleon and Frederick with all their armies and

Empires as easy as he would toss a guinea; he shoulders a continent with as much facility as a farmer would shoulder his bushel of wheat. He strides from the rock of Gibraltar to Kamschatka with one colossal step—from there to Moscow with another. He at the same instant stamps the Prussian monarchy in the dust with one foot, kicks the breath out of John Bull with the other, and washes his hands in the Dwina. Why, sir, he compounds politics, morality, ethics, mineralogy, history, law, chemistry, astronomy, philosophy, patriotism, and whiskey, into one composition, with as much ease as the druggist pounds and compounds soap and aloes for pills. Really, sir, I could have no reason to expect the gentleman could condescend to know the district whose humble representative I am. But, sir, I will give the gentleman some information on this subject; and first, permit me to tell him, if I am to receive his moral and political principles as a sample of his constituents, I can assure him, that it is a high consolation to me that I do not represent the district of Philadelphia. But I do represent a district of plain farmers, who earn their bread by the sweat of their brow, who are affectionate, generous, sincere, and should their rights ever be invaded, their enemies will find they are brave; they are a people, sir, who labor six days, and who worship their God one.

It is true, that money in my district is not so abundant, nor does it possess the active principles or power which the gentleman mentions, nor has it so much patriotism, that when the governmental box is opened, like a tame pigeon, it will run or fly instantly into the cage. No, sir, money in my district has no such convenient property, even at seven and a half per cent., as it has in the district of the gentleman.

If the gentleman has any more of this travelling money, call it what he pleases, soul or body of war, I sincerely wish that some of it may stray to the North, and save my poor desponding constituents from that ruin, which the indiscreet measures of those he calls his friends have brought upon them. If the gentleman will send but a few dozen of genuine bank notes into my obscure district, I will obligate myself, that my constituents shall release to the gentleman and his constituents, all the blessings of war and direct taxes.

Sir, the gentleman's speech delivered yesterday was a very great speech, and if you judge of its merits by its superficial contents, (not weight,) length and breadth, by the foot, board measure, the speech has rarely been matched by any speech either of ancient or modern times, from the days of Isocrates, down to the honorable gentleman, from the great and patriotic whiskey-hating city of Philadelphia.

Now, sir, one word about whiskey. The gentleman has told us his city drinks no whiskey; of course I presume the gentleman drinks none, and from the very exalted reputation he has in such a glowing manner given to Mr. Gallatin, I should presume he drinks none, and yet, sir, he (Mr. INGERSOLL) tells us, that the Secretary of the Treasury is now more than half seas over. Sir, if the honorable gentleman from Pennsylvania has not imbibed whiskey, he must have inhaled something at least as exhilarating, he must have snuffed a full portion of oxygen; for sir, it is impossible that the gentleman should be delivered of so great a speech, which, if measured as before mentioned, would entitle him to rank with the distinguished orators of the House—a speech which the gentleman acknowledges he has carried for three instead of nine months, since its first inception, or rather conception—without some powerful inspiration, and that he had this aid, no one who heard him could doubt, for really sir, my mind was very much bewildered, or the gentleman was farther over seas than the honorable whiskey-hating Secretary of the Treasury.

Now, sir, if the Committee will forgive me for this long digression, which really has nothing to do with my honorable colleague's motion (Mr. TAYLOR) no more than two hours and a half of the honorable gentleman's (Mr. INGERSOLL) speech had with the subject then under consideration, and which digression I have made with no other motive than to pay the gentleman a debt of courtesy, which I really and honestly owed him for travelling so far to visit me, I will settle a small account with the gentleman which has some connexion with this subject.

If I understood the gentleman, he stated expressly that morality and taxes had no connexion. Now, sir, I appeal to the good sense and moral feelings of the Committee, to refute a statement so absurd, and by that good sense and those feelings it will most undoubtedly be proved to be incorrect. Sir, is it nothing to a Legislature, whether their laws promote or destroy public, moral, and private virtue? without which, let me tell the gentleman, (Mr. INGERSOLL) no Government ever did or ever will long remain, no country ever was, or ever will be prosperous.

It is the want of virtue, and the want of piety in law-makers, that court the angry frowns of Omnipotence upon their country, which will at one time or other meet with the blighting curse, that shall wither and destroy all prosperity, peace, and even hope itself.

To me, sir, it appears of great importance, that our laws should be so framed as to cherish the morals of our countrymen, to prohibit their vices, to punish the evil doer, and hold forth strong inducements for men to be industrious, prudent, and upright. I consider, sir, that a severe tax on ardent liquors will produce this effect. If it is high priced, the intemperate who have not ample means to purchase, will drink less, and thereby contract sober habits. If it is very low and easily obtained, it will be but a bait that will invite to intoxication. For my part I am very willing, if we must have internal taxes, to tax thoroughly that which tends to the promotion of evil, and to leave unburdened that from whose breast we derive the nurture which sustains life.

Sir, I will make but one more remark. It is but justice that the burdens as well as the benefits resulting from our Union, should be equally borne. Those who live near the seaboard pay a large revenue to the Government, which is laid on imported liquors, while the more remote part of the Union pay little or nothing. Certainly, sir, it must be perfectly reasonable, that they too should contribute their share, at least, in some proportion to the advantages they experience. For these reasons, I hope sir, the motion may meet the approbation of the Committee.

JULY, 1813.

The Ways and Means.

H. OF R.

The question was then taken on striking out the second section of the bill and decided in the affirmative—yeas 73, nays 68.

The Committee of the Whole then rose, and reported the bill with this and other amendments.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the whole House. The question on concurring with the Committee in striking out the second section of the bill was taken by yeas and nays, and decided in the negative. For concurrence 81, against it 82, as follows:

So that the amendment of the Committee of the Whole was disagreed to, the second section reinstated, and the bill was again referred to the same committee.

THURSDAY, July 1.

Mr. ARCHER presented sundry documents in relation to the petition of John Pitchlyn; which were ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. MILLER, the select committee were discharged from the petition of Theophilus Barbaric, and the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to prohibit the citizens of the United States from carrying on any trade or traffic with the dominions or dependencies of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland;" also a bill "authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be built barges for the defence of the ports and harbors of the United States;" also, a bill "to incorporate a fire insurance company, in the town of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have also passed the bill from this House, "to reward the officers and crew of the sloop of war Hornet," with an amendment, in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The first mentioned bill of the Senate was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to morrow.

The second mentioned bill of the Senate was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Naval Establishment.

The third mentioned bill of the Senate was read twice, and referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to reward the officers and crew of the sloop of war Hornet," were read, and referred to the Committee on the Naval Establishment.

WAYS AND MEANS.

An engrossed bill for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties was read the third time; and, on the question that the same do pass, it passed in the affirmative—yeas 94, nays 63, as follows:

Mr. CONDUCT moved to be permitted to record his vote in the affirmative; which was determined in the negative.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill, which has been recommitted to this Committee, laying a duty on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors.

Mr. TAYLOR renewed the motion which he made yesterday with success, in the Committee of the Whole, but which was reversed by a majority of one vote in the House, viz: to strike out the second section of the bill, which imposes specific duties, according to the length of time for which the license is renewed, of — cents for each gallon of the capacity of every still.

The question on the motion was decided in the negative: For the motion 65, against it 81.

Mr. FISK then moved an amendment, the object of which was to increase the duty on the capacity of the still to thirty-three and a third per cent. more than it now stands in the bill; which motion was decided in the negative: For the motion 70, against it 78.

Sundry other amendments were proposed and discussed, some of which were adopted and others rejected.

After this bill was gone through, the Committee took up the bill for laying a direct tax, and, having made progress, the Committee rose and reported progress; and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, July 2.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill establishing the town of Mobile a port of entry; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

Mr. CRAWFORD, from the committee appointed on the petition of James Lloyd, made a report; which was read, and the resolution therein contained concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That the petition of James Lloyd, with the accompanying documents, be referred to the Secretary of the Navy, and that he be directed to make such inquiries and experiments on the subject as he may think necessary, and report the result thereof to this House, or otherwise employ the petitioner in the service of the United States, as he may think himself warranted from the nature of the discovery, and the result of the experiments made thereon under his direction.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, reported the agreement of the Committee to the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "to reward the officers and crew of the sloop of war Hornet."

Ordered, That the said amendments be committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

Mr. NELSON, from the same committee, also reported the bill from the Senate "authorizing the President of the United States to cause to be built barges for the defence of the ports and harbors of the United States."

Ordered, That the said bill be committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill last mentioned.

After a short but animated debate on this bill the Committee rose, and reported the bill to the House; which was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, in the following words:

"Be it enacted, &c., That, for the protection of the ports and harbors of the United States, the President shall cause to be built, without delay, such number of barges as he may deem necessary, to be armed, equipped, and manned as he may direct, of a size not less than forty-five feet long, and capable of carrying heavy guns."

The bill was subsequently read a third time, and passed, without a division.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FISK, from the Committee of Elections, to whom was referred a resolution directing an inquiry into the legality of the election of JOHN M. BOWERS, a sitting member from the State of New York, made the following report:

That, by a return of the votes from the fifteenth district, in said State, it appears that John M. Bowers had 4,287; Isaac Williams, junior, 4,129; Isaac Williams 434; John M. Bowey 1; several other persons, in all 17.

From this statement, it results that John M. Bowers had a majority of 158 votes over Isaac Williams, jun.

By the affidavit of Luther Bissell, and the statement of the sitting member, it appears that there are three persons of the name of Isaac Williams, residing within the district, one of whom is designated by the addition junior; and it is candidly admitted by Mr. Bowers, that Isaac Williams, junior, and John M. Bowers, were the only candidates at this election, within his knowledge. It appears probable to the Committee that the votes given to John Bowers and John M. Bowey were all intended for John M. Bowers; and that those given for Isaac Williams were intended for Isaac Williams, junior; which opinion seems to be strengthened by the fact that, in four towns in said district, nearly one hundred votes were given in each for Isaac Williams, and not one for Isaac Williams, junior. If this be admitted,

| | | | | |
|-----------------------------------|---|---|---|-------|
| Isaac Williams, junior, will have | - | - | - | 4,563 |
| John M. Bowers, | - | - | - | 4,358 |

Leaving to Isaac Williams, junior, a majority of 205

But the Committee are of opinion that further evidence is necessary, to form a correct decision; and, in order to afford time to procure the same, they respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the further consideration of this subject be postponed to the first Wednesday of the next session of Congress."

The report was concurred in.

DEFENCE OF MARITIME FRONTIER.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to amend the act in addition to the act for raising an additional military force.

The first section of the bill authorizes the enlistment (at the discretion of the Executive) of five of the regiments of what are usually called the twelve months' men (authorized by an act of last session) to be for and during the war, instead of twelve months, to be limited, as to service, to the defence of the seaboard of the United States, or of such part thereof as the President may select and determine.

This section having been read—

Mr. TROUP explained the views of the Military Committee in recommending the passage of this bill. He spoke of the state of defence of our seaboard. It would be indiscreet and imprudent, he said, to enter into an explanation of the state of our seaports, as to their relative state of defence. It was true, that all our seaports might not be perfectly defended; but the situation of the United States in this respect was pretty much the situation of every country engaged in a state of war. It was never practicable for any Government to place beyond the reach of insult every point of its frontier. If our population were a thousand times more dense, if our military resources were a thousand times greater, we should not be able effectually to protect our seacoast. When we look at Holland and France, with their dense population, and multiplied resources, and find that they are not at all times exempt from apprehension and danger, we feel the less disposition to be dissatisfied at the present state of our maritime fortifications and defence. Notwithstanding the defence of our harbors is by no means perfect; it is, at least, respectable, and nearly complete, so far as fortifications are efficient to that end. Mr. T. said, he could go further than this, and say that the maritime cities of Europe are not generally better defended than ours. Supposing for a moment that the fortifications on our seaboard could be extended into a line of battery or redoubt along the coast, you would have a heavy piece of artillery at every distance of one thousand four hundred yards. This must be considered at least a tolerable defence. A few additional fortifications, however, were yet required, and a force adequate to man them. True it was, Mr. T. said, that we had men in abundance in service, militia, and volunteers; but militia and volunteers would not do for garrison duty. It would be idle for him at this day to enter into an argument to show that this species of force was not serviceable for garrison duty. It was necessary to substitute this force by one of a different description, better qualified for that duty. It was therefore proposed to raise five regiments of men exclusively for this purpose; which, with five regiments of the twelve months' men authorized to be raised on the Atlantic border, and five regiments of other troops to be retained in service, would make an aggregate of fifteen thousand men for the defence of our maritime frontier.

Mr. T., however, wished so to modify the bill as that the destination of this force should be subject to be changed by act of Congress, if Congress should hereafter deem it expedient; and he moved an amendment to that effect.

After a desultory debate, in which Messrs. TROUP, GHOLSON, WRIGHT, CLAY, GROSVENOR, BRADLEY, and TAYLOR, took part, principally turning on the propriety of enlisting men for a particular service or destination, this amendment was negatived—58 to 52.

Mr. BRADLEY moved to strike out the whole of that part of the section which restricts these men to a particular service; which motion was negatived.

The remaining sections of the bill, relating to minor amendments in the existing laws relating to the army, were struck out, on motion of Mr. TROUP, and the bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Elections, unfavorable to the petition of John Taliaferro, contesting the election of John P. Hungerford.

At the usual hour of adjournment the Committee rose, after much debate, without having gone through the business, and were refused leave to sit again, and the House adjourned.

SATURDAY, July 3.

Mr. SEYBERT presented a petition of William Thornton, keeper of the Patent Office, praying an increase of compensation, and that the privilege of franking may be extended to him in his official capacity.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The engrossed bill establishing the town of Mobile a port of entry, was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. BENSON laid upon the table a resolution to the following effect, with an intimation that he should call for its consideration on Monday:

“Resolved, That a committee be appointed by this House, jointly with a committee to be appointed by the Senate, to consider what business is necessary to be done before the adjournment of Congress, and to report at what time the two Houses may adjourn.”

On motion of Mr. BIBB, the further consideration of the supplemental report of the Committee of Elections, on the contested election of John P. Hungerford, was postponed until Monday next.

PUNISHMENT OF PIRACY.

Mr. INGERSOLL, after a number of pertinent remarks on the present defects of the law providing for the punishment of piracy, and on the jarring decisions made by the judiciary officers thereon, and also on the present vexatious and difficult mode of taking depositions to be read in the courts of the United States, offered two resolutions for inquiry into the propriety of amending the laws in these respects. These resolutions he proposed to lay on the table, to be called up at the next session of Congress. On the suggestion of the Speaker, that this course was contrary to the rules, according to which a postponement beyond the session is tantamount to a general or indefinite postponement, the House refused to consider the resolutions, which now, of course, lie on the table. The resolutions are as follows:

1. Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so altering that part of the thirteenth section of the act of the 24th September, 1789, entitled "An act to establish the Judicial Courts of the United States," as relates to the regulations for taking depositions to be read in the courts of the United States, as will afford a more certain and less defective mode of taking depositions and testimony in general, than is now prescribed by the said section of the said act.

2. Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the several laws of the United States relating to that subject, as more effectually to define the crimes of piracy and robbery on the high seas, and provide the punishment therefor, and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

BILLS FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "for the relief of Thomas Denney;" also a bill to relinquish the claims of the United States to certain goods, wares, and merchandise, captured by private armed vessels;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

The first mentioned bill from the Senate was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

The second mentioned bill from the Senate was read twice and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The House spent some time in Committee of the Whole, on the bill for laying a direct tax, and having risen at the usual hour, the Committee obtained leave to sit again.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors, and the same being again read were concurred in by the House.

A motion was then made by Mr. TAYLOR, further to amend the bill by striking out the first and second sections, after the enacting clause, and to insert the following:

That, upon all spirits which, after the first day of January next, shall be distilled within the United States, wholly or in part, from molasses, sugar, or other foreign materials, there shall be paid for their use, the duties following, that is to say:

For every gallon of those spirits, of the first class of proof, ten cents; for every gallon of those spirits, of the second class of proof, eleven cents; for every gallon of those spirits, of the third class of proof, twelve cents; for every gallon of those spirits, of the fourth class of proof, fourteen cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the fifth class of proof, eighteen cents; and for every gallon of those spirits of the sixth class of proof, twenty-five cents. And, upon all spirits which, after the said day, shall be distilled within the United States, from materials of the growth or produce of the United States, there shall be paid the duties following, that is to say:

For every gallon of those spirits of the first class of proof, seven cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the second class of proof, eight cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the third class of proof, nine cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the fourth class of proof, eleven cents; for every gallon of those spirits of the fifth class of proof, thirteen cents; and, for every gallon of those spirits of the sixth class of proof, eighteen cents.

The question was taken on Mr. TAYLOR's amendment, and there appeared—yeas 82, nays 82, as follows:

Mr. GRUNDY moved to amend the bill by adding thereto a clause limiting the duration of this act to the end of the present war.

Mr. FISK moved to amend this amendment so as to limit the duration of the law to one year, and to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter. This motion was negatived, yeas 54.

After some objections to the motion of Mr. GRUNDY by Mr. MONTGOMERY and Mr. FISK, and in reply thereto by Mr. BIBB, the question thereon was decided in the affirmative—yeas 85, nays 43.

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, moved further to amend the bill, by adding a new section thereto, as follows:

And for the encouragement of the export trade of the United States:—

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That, if any quantity, not less than one hundred gallons, of the spirits distilled at any of the stills, whereupon any of the duties imposed by this act shall have been paid, or secured to be paid, shall, after the — day of — next, be exported from the United States, to any foreign port or place, there shall be an allowance to the exporter or exporters thereof, by way of drawback, a sum equal to the duties on the still or stills while employed in distilling the quantity of spirits so to be exported, of which a true account shall be given by the distiller, on oath, deducting from such drawback, half a cent per gallon, and adding to the allowance upon spirits distilled within the United States from molasses, which shall be so exported, ten cents per gallon, as an equivalent for the duty upon molasses; which drawback shall be under the same provisions, restrictions, and limitations, as drawbacks on foreign goods, wares, and merchandise, entered for exportation, or entitled to a drawback, agreeably to “An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage;” mutatis mutandis; and substituting the collector of internal duties for the collector of customs.

And the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, to insert, before the word “domestic,” in the fifth line of the second section, the words “foreign or,” and to strike out from the said second section, the following words:

And the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 67, nays 83, as follows:

On motion of Mr. BIBB, the bill was then ordered to lie on the table.

The Ways and Means.

JULY, 1813.

MONDAY, July 5.

Mr. FISK, of New York, presented a petition of sundry aliens, lately residing in the city of New York, and now remaining at Fishkill, in the State of New York, stating their intention to become citizens of the United States, having taken the preparatory steps; and praying permission to return to the city of New York for the purpose of pursuing their usual avocations, under such restrictions as Congress may think proper to prescribe.—Referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of War on the petition of William Tatham, referred to him at the last session of Congress.—Laid on the table.

On motion of Mr. BENSON, the House proceeded to consider the resolution, submitted by him on the third instant, relative to an adjournment of Congress; and the same being again read, was concurred in by the House; and Mr. BENSON, Mr. GRUNDY, Mr. HYNEMAN, Mr. TELFAIR, and Mr. MCCOY, were appointed the committee on the part of this House.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors.

The question recurred on the proviso proposed by Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, and depending on Saturday; on which Mr. KING withdrew the said proviso.

A motion was then made by Mr. PITKIN to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instruction to report a section or sections allowing a drawback on the exportation of spirits distilled from foreign materials; and negatived—yeas 42, nays 108, as follows:

Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, then moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, with instruction to equalize the duties on the stills employed in distilling from both foreign and domestic materials. Negatived.

The question was then taken that the bill be engrossed and read the third time, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 51, as follows:

The bill was then ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the tax bills. The bill to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States, was then taken up, and discussed, amended and reported to the House, and the Committee obtained leave to sit again, on the remaining bills.

The House then proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole on the direct tax bill; but adjourned before having gone through the same.

TUESDAY, July 6.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate, "for the relief of infirm, disabled, and superannuated officers and soldiers of the late and of the present Army of the United States," without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

JULY, 1813.

The Ways and Means.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The engrossed bill to lay a duty on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors, was read a third time.

[This bill proposes a duty on licenses to distillers, as follows: For the employment of a still or stills employed in distilling spirits from domestic materials; for two weeks, nine cents for each gallon of the capacity thereof, including the head; for one month, eighteen cents; for two months, thirty-two cents; for three months, forty-two cents; for four months, fifty-two cents; for six months, seventy cents; for one year, one hundred and eight cents for each gallon of its capacity as aforesaid. For a license for the employment of a still or stills in the distillation of spirits from foreign materials: for one month, twenty-five cents for each gallon of its capacity; for three months, sixty cents; for six months, one hundred and five cents; for one year, one hundred and thirty-five cents for each gallon of its capacity. And for every boiler, however constructed, employed in distilleries by steam, double the amount on each gallon of its capacity, which would be payable for said license if granted for the same terms and to employ the same materials for a still.]

The bill was passed, by the following vote:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Barnett, Beall, Bibb, Bowen, Brown, Burwell, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Cheves, Clopton, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Duvall, Earle, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of New York, Forsyth, Franklin, Gholson, Glasgow, Goodwyn, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Harris, Hasbrouck, Hawes, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hubbard, Hungerford, Hyneman, Ingham, Irwin, Jackson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Leflerts, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKee, McKim, McLean, Moore, Murfree, Newton, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Roane, Roberts, Robertson, Sevier, Skinner, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup, Ward of New Jersey, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wood, Wright, and Yancey—85.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the whole House to the bill to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States.

And the said amendments being read, at the Clerk's table, a motion was made by Mr. FISK, of New York, to disagree to the amendment to strike out the words "one hundred and seventy thousand two hundred and seventy dollars," the sum proposed by the said bill to be levied and collected within the city and county of New York: When, a motion was made by Mr. Post, that the bill be recommitted to the Committee of Ways and Means; and, the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken on the motion of Mr. FISK, to disagree to the said amendment; and passed in the affirmative.

One other amendment proposed by the Committee of the whole House, was also disagreed to, and the residue of the said amendments were concurred in by the House.

A motion was then made by Mr. BURWELL further to amend the bill, by striking out therefrom that part which apportions the tax on the several counties of Virginia, and, in lieu thereof, to insert the following:

A motion was then made, by Mr. PITKIN, further to amend the bill by striking out the following:

“Which several quotas on the counties of the State of Ohio, are exclusively of the taxes on lands lying in the said counties, respectively, and owned by persons not residing in the State.”

And the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 62, nays 81, as follows:

And the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, July 7.

Mr. BENSON presented a petition of Benjamin B. Blydenburgh and Peter A. Jay, complaining of the undue election and return of Ebenezer Sage and John Lefferts, as two of the members from the State of New York, and praying to be admitted to seats in the House in place of the said Sage and Lefferts.—Referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. MCKEE, from the Committee on the Public Lands, reported a bill giving further time for registering claims to lands in the late district of Arkansas, in the Territory of Missouri; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

On motion of Mr. MCKEE, the Committee on the Public Lands were discharged from the consideration of such petitions and other subjects referred to them, upon which no report has been made.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill “to incorporate a company for making a certain turnpike road in the county of Washington, in the District of Columbia,” with amendments; also, a bill “to incorporate a company for making a certain turnpike road in the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia,” also with amendment; in which amendments they desire the concurrence of this House.

The amendments were then severally read, and concurred in.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the bill from the Senate, “supplementary to the acts heretofore passed upon the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization,” with amendments; which were read, and, with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole on Friday next.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States.

A motion was made by Mr. HARRIS, further to amend the bill, by adding to the end of the 499th line of the second section, the following proviso:

Provided, That, so far as respects the State of Tennessee, the principal assessors, respectively, within twenty days after they shall have finished hearing appeals, shall not proceed to make out lists containing the sums payable according to the assessments upon every object of taxation, as is required by the 15th section of “An act for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties,” but shall, within that time, make out and cause to be transmitted to the principal assessor of the fifth district at Nashville, in said State, a true and perfect copy of the assessments made in each county in his assessment district: And provided, That, if there be no failure, either on the part of the assistant assessors in making their returns, or on the part of the principal assessors in causing copies to be transmitted as aforesaid, the said principal assessor of the fifth district shall immediately proceed to ascertain the quota of each county in the State, by making it bear the same proportion to the whole quota of the State as the assessed value of the property subject to the direct tax in each county bears to the assessed value of the property subject to said tax in the whole State; which apportionment shall be adopted and taken by said State, instead of the one hereinbefore provided. And the principal assessor of the fifth district, having thus made the apportionment, shall proceed to make out lists in conformity with the provisions of the aforesaid 15th section of the before recited act, and these provisoes, and shall immediately transmit a copy thereof to each principal collector within the State.

Mr. POST moved to amend the amendment by inserting the word "New York," after the word "Tennessee." And the question thereon being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN, the said amendment was further amended by inserting the word "Connecticut," after "New York."

On motion of Mr. BRADLEY, the said amendment was further amended by inserting the word "Vermont."

On motion of Mr. WARD, of Massachusetts, the said amendment was further amended by inserting the word "Massachusetts."

On motion of Mr. MCCOY, the said amendment was further amended by inserting the word "Virginia."

On motion of Mr. STOCKTON, the said amendment was further amended by inserting the word "New Jersey."

On motion of Mr. FORNEY, the said amendment was further amended by inserting the word "North Carolina."

On motion of Mr. CHEVES, the said amendment was further amended by inserting the word "South Carolina."

The previous question was called for by Mr. GHOLSON, and being demanded by a majority of the members present, it was taken in the form prescribed by the rules of the House, to wit: "Shall the main question be now put?" and passed in the affirmative—yeas 83, nays 78, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Anderson, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Beall, Bibb, Butler, Caldwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Cheves, Clark, Copton, Comstock, Condict, Conard, Crawford, Creighton, Davis of Pa., Denoyelles, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Evans, Farrow, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Forney, Forsyth, Gholson, Goodwyn, Gourdin, Griffin, Grundy, Hall, Hopkins of Kentucky, Hyneman, Ingersoll, Ingham, Irwin, Jackson of Virginia, Kennedy, Kerr, Kershaw, Kilbourn, King of North Carolina, Lelferts, Lowndes, Lyle, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moore, Nelson, Newton, Ormsby, Parker, Pickens, Piper, Pleasants, Rea of Pa., Rich, Richardson, Ringgold, Roane, Roberts, Robertson, Sevier, Seybert, Smith of Pennsylvania, Smith of Virginia, Strong, Tannehill, Taylor, Telfair, Troup,

A motion was then made by Mr. PITKIN, further to amend the bill by inserting the foregoing proviso, proposed by Mr. HARRIS, with all the amendments which had been made thereto by the House, after the 499th line of the second section.

The SPEAKER decided it to be out of order, as the House have determined that the main question shall now be put; which main question is, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read the third time?" which puts aside the amendment proposed, and precludes further amendment.

From which decision of the Speaker, Mr. PITKIN appealed to the House.

The question was then taken, "Is the decision of the Chair correct?" and passed in the affirmative—yeas, 98, nays 68, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. The bill was then ordered to be read the third time to-morrow.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, to whom was committed the bill for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties, and on the several bills committed to the said Committee of the Whole; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported the bill to establish the office of Commissioner of the Revenue, with amendments; and also, the bill laying duties on sugar refined within the United States, with amendments; and also, the bill laying duties on sales at auction of merchandise, and of ships and vessels, with amendments; and asked leave to sit again on the other subjects referred to them; which was granted.

The amendments reported to the bill to establish the office of Commissioner of the Revenue, were concurred in by the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The amendments reported to the bill laying duties on sugar refined within the United States, were concurred in by the House, except the amendment to the end of the third section, which was disagreed to; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The amendments reported to the bill laying duties on sales at auction of merchandise, and of ships or vessels, were concurred in by the House. The bill was then further amended, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

THURSDAY, July 8.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "making an appropriation for finishing the Senate Chamber, and repairing the roof of the north wing of the Capitol;" also, a bill "providing for the further defence of the ports and harbors of the United States;" also, a bill "for the relief of the owners of the ships called the Good Friends, the Amazon, and the United States, and their cargoes;" in which bills they desire the concurrence of this House.

ARMING THE MILITIA.

Mr. TROUP, from the Military Committee, who were directed to inquire into the expediency of amending the laws for arming the whole body of the Militia, so far as respects the distribution of the arms, made a report of considerable length, stating generally, as the opinion of the committee, that it will be inexpedient to make any amendment to the said acts. This report was read, and ordered to lie on the table. It is as follows:

That the funds appropriated by the act of 23d April, for arming the whole body of the Militia, amounted, on the 23d day of April last, to one million of dollars; that, of this sum, ninety-four thousand seven hundred and ninety-two dollars have been actually expended; and that the whole number of arms procured, up to this day, amounts to 34,477 stands, all derived under contracts of supply; that of these the following disposition has been made, viz:

JULY, 1813.

Arming the Militia.

H. OF R.

Making an aggregate of 26,000 stands delivered, and leaving a balance of 8,477 stands, subject to future distribution.

That the aforesaid distribution has been made in virtue of the authority conferred by the third section of the act of April, 1808, which is as follows: "That all the arms procured in virtue of this act, shall be transmitted to the several States composing this Union, and Territories thereof, to each State and Territory, respectively, in proportion to the number of effective militia in each State and Territory; and by each State and Territory to be distributed to the militia in such State and Territory, under such rules and regulations as shall be by law prescribed by the Legislature of each State and Territory."

The language of this section is clear, and admits of but one construction; the proportion to which each State is entitled is secured by it; each State having contributed its just proportion of money to the purchase, each State is entitled to receive its just proportion of arms. "Shall be transmitted to each State and Territory, respectively, in proportion to the number of effective militia in each State and Territory." Transmitted. When? "At such time as the Executive may deem proper." This is the only construction, in the opinion of your committee, of which the language of the section is susceptible. If the intention of the Legislature had been to bind the Executive to a simultaneous or periodical transmission, the language of the section would have been different: "shall be transmitted at the same time," or "shall be transmitted annually, or biennially, or triennially," would have been the language of the Legislature. The time of transmission not being specified, therefore, but left, as your committee conclude, to a sound Executive discretion, the question is, whether any alteration in the act of April, 1808, be, in this respect, expedient?

In legislation it is extremely difficult, and frequently impossible, to foresee all the exigencies which may arise under a particular act, and, consequently, extremely difficult, and frequently impossible, to make adequate provision for them. In some cases, even the Legislature foreseeing a possible exigency, it would be unwise to anticipate and provide for it by the express letter of the law. Would it become the Legislature of the Union, for instance, to anticipate the rebellion of a State against the authority of the United States, and to enact that "no State, in actual rebellion against the United States, should be entitled to receive its proportion of arms?" Your committee presume not. A legislation of this character would, to say nothing of the violence it would offer to the enlightened sensibility of the National Legislature, be the means, when frequently indulged, of bringing about that very state of things which cannot be thought of without horror, and which ought not to be spoken of at all. In every act of legislation, therefore, something must be left to implication; something must be left to discretion. But there are other considerations which, in the opinion of your committee, justify the discretion as to the time of transmission.

A war unexpectedly breaks out; a particular section is exposed to the assaults of the enemy; that section is destitute of arms; shall the enemy be suffered to advance, to lay waste with fire and sword, because the President is bound by the letter of the law so to distribute the arms as that each State shall, at the same time, receive a proportion exactly equal to the number of its effective militia! No, would be the exclamation from one end of the Union to the other; let the safety of a part be consulted, though the whole suffer inconvenience. Yet, were such the letter of the law, the Executive would, under any circumstances, be bound to respect it. The act of the 23d of April, 1808, was passed in a season of profound peace; contemplating future wars, it looked to no particular war; it had just gone into operation, had scarcely developed its first fruits, when the present war broke out. The war found the militia badly armed; it found particular portions of them worse armed and more exposed than others. Would it have been wise, under these circumstances, to distribute 30,000 stands of arms equally among 800,000 militia? Or would it have been wiser to consult the wants and exposure of particular portions?

But suppose it were expedient, in the opinion of your committee, to define with precision the time of transmission; what period ought to be selected? If a yearly, or biennial, or triennial distribution, were adopted, it might happen, by casualty or accident, that, within the period limited, no arms were received, or so few, that the expense and trouble of distribution would exceed the expense of manufacture; and what would the distribution of a dozen or an hundred stands of arms avail the militia of a great State? They would be lost in the transmission, or suffered by the States to lie neglected and forgotten. In the distribution by the States themselves, among their own militia, it is more than probable they would be governed by the same principle as that by which the recent disposition by the United States has seemed to be regulated. Would a State having one thousand companies of militia so scrupulously consult the principle of equality, in the distribution of one thousand stand of arms, as to give one musket and bayonet to each company? It may fairly be presumed not; the wants, the frontier position, and the exposure of particular parts of the State, would be much more likely to regulate the distribution: those of the militia, to be sure, from whom, for the moment, they were withheld, might complain of a departure from the principle of exact equality; but with what concern would the Legislative body of such State regard such complaints?

For these, and various other reasons, which might be adduced, but with which your committee forbear to trouble the House, they are of opinion that, for the present at least, the act of April, 1808, requires no alterations. They are the more confirmed in this opinion, because they have reason to believe that there has been no misconstruction of the law; that the seeming irregularity which has taken place has grown out of the exigency of the times; that a disposition exists to correct such irregularity, as soon as circumstances will admit; that the correction is, in fact, at this moment proceeding; that, in due time, all the States must and will receive their respective proportions of arms; and, in fine, that the immediate representatives of the people in Congress, inspecting, as they do, with never-ceasing vigilance, the execution of this, as well as every other law, stand ready to apply the remedy whenever right, or justice, or expediency, shall seem to them to demand it.

COMMITTEE ROOM, June 30, 1813.

SIR: I am directed, by the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom has been referred a resolution instructing them to inquire what alterations are necessary in the act of the 23d of April, 1808, providing for the arming the whole body of the militia of the United States, to ask information on the following points, viz:

1st. What number of arms have been received by the United States since the 24th day of December, 1812, under contracts or purchases, for carrying into effect the aforesaid act of the 23d April, 1808?

2d. Whether, since the 24th day of December, 1812, any further disposition has been made of the arms acquired under the act of 23d April, 1808, and, if any further disposition, to what amount, to what States and Territories, and the number to each, respectively?

3d. By what authority eight thousand one hundred stand of arms have been, as appears by a report from your Department, made to the House of Representatives 24th December, 1812, loaned to several States and Territories, and whether the arms so loaned were arms acquired under the authority of the aforesaid act of the 23d of April, 1808?

Or any other information in possession of your Department touching the distribution of arms acquired under the act of 1808, and which will enable the committee to comply with the instruction of the House.

WAR DEPARTMENT, July 6, 1813.

SIR: In reply to the note you did me the honor to write to me on the 30th ultimo, I beg leave to state, that two thousand eight hundred and thirty-seven stands of arms have been received into the public stores since December, 1812, under contracts made pursuant to law; and that deliveries of arms, since that period, to the amount of seven thousand stands, have been made, as follows, viz:

- 2,000 to the State of Connecticut.
- 2,000 to the State of New York.
- 1,500 to the State of Maryland.
- 1,500 to the State of Louisiana.

The arms stated in the report of December last to have been loaned, were, in part, acquired under the act of the 23d of April, 1808, viz:

1,500 delivered to Major General Wadsworth, of Ohio; and,

2,200 to the District of Columbia. And are considered as furnished under that law. In the former of these cases, the exigence growing out of the surrender of General Hull did not leave to this Department time for the employment of the customary form of getting the receipt of the Governor. The balance of loaned arms (2,900) was not acquired under the aforesaid act.

Accept, sir, the assurance of my very high respect,
JOHN ARMSTRONG.

Hon. Mr. TROUP.

REMONSTRANCE OF MASSACHUSETTS.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, said, that he had hoped that some other gentleman than himself would have moved to take up the memorial now lying on the table from the Legislature of Massachusetts. That paper contained statements highly important to the interests and character of the nation. If they were true, the people ought to know it; if false, they ought to be refuted. Divisions, Mr. F. said, prevailed in Republics, that is, in all free Governments, at all seasons, but particularly in times of war. There existed now a considerable degree of uneasiness in the Eastern section of the Union, which this remonstrance was not calculated to assuage. There was a great thirst for correct information, which this remonstrance was not calculated to satisfy. Because he was willing that the people should be correctly informed, and that the misrepresentations in the memorial should be corrected, he moved that the House now proceed to a consideration of the remonstrance, with a view to refer it to a select committee, to report thereon.

The question on taking up the memorial was decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 58, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Alexander, Alston, Archer, Avery, Bard, Barnett, Baylies of Massachusetts, Bibb, Bigelow, Bowen, Bradbury, Bradley, Breckenridge, Brigham, Butler, Caperton, Caldwell, Cilley, Clopton, Comstock, Condict, Crawford, Culpeper, Davenport, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Pennsylvania, Denoyelles, Dewey, Ely, Findley, Fisk of Vermont, Franklin, Goddes, Glasgow, Goldsborough, Goodwyn, Griffin, Grosvenor, Grundy, Hale, Hall, Hanson, Hasbrouck, Hubbard, Humphreys, Hungerford, Ingersoll, Irwin, Kent of New York, Kilbourn, King of Massachusetts, Lefferts, Lewis, Lovett, Lyle, Macon, McCoy, McKim, McLean, Moseley, Nelson, Newton, Oakley, Ormsby, Parker, Pickering, Pitkin, John Reed, Rea of Pennsylvania, Rhea of Tennessee, Rich, Ringgold, Roane, Ruggles, Sevier, Sharp, Sherwood, Shipherd, Skinner, Smith of New Hampshire, Smith of New York, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Strong, Stuart, Taggart, Tallmadge, Tannehill, Taylor, Thompson, Troup, Vose, Ward of Massachusetts, Ward of New Jersey, Wheaton, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, and Wood.

NAYS—Messrs. Beall, Benson, Boyd, Burwell, Calhoun, Chappell, Cheves, Clark, Conard, Cox, Creighton, Desha, Duvall, Earle, Evans, Farrow, Forney, Gaston, Gholson, Gourdin, Harris, Hawes, Hopkins of Kentucky, Howell, Hufty, Hyneman, Ingham, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kennedy, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Kershaw, King of North Carolina, Lowndes, Markell, McKee, Miller, Moore, Murfree, Pickins, Piper, Pleasants, Post, Potter, Ridgely, Roberts, Robertson, Sage, Schureman, Seybert, Sheffield, Stockton, Sturges, Telfair, Whitehill, Wilson of Pennsylvania, Wright, and Yancey.

Mr. FISK, of Vermont, then moved to refer it to a select committee.

Mr. ROBERTSON moved to amend the motion so as to except from the general reference so much as relates to the admission of Louisiana into the Union.

Mr. FISK agreed to modify his motion so as to incorporate that of the gentleman from Louisiana.

Mr. KING, of North Carolina, moved to postpone the further consideration of this subject to the 1st Monday in December next.

Mr. MURFREE moved that it lie on the table.

On these several motions a debate of about two hours took place. Those who advocated a reference of the memorial to a select committee, did it on the ground that its misstatements of fact and its false reasoning merited refutation, which would be an easy task, and was due to the official and formal nature of this production. It was opposed by gentlemen of both parties, on the ground that the discussion of such a report as might be expected to be made on this memorial would occupy too much time, and protract a session which ought soon to draw to a close; and it was opposed also by some gentlemen as being inconsistent with the dignity of this House to enter into a mere political disputation with the Legislature of Massachusetts, or of any other State.

The question to lay this memorial on the table was in the end negatived—yeas 48; and the postponement to December next agreed to by a large majority.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The bill for laying and collecting a direct tax within the United States was read a third time.

[This bill proposes to lay upon the United States a direct tax to the amount of three millions of dollars, apportioned to the States respectively, as follows:

The bill also apportions the quota of each State among the counties in said State. Each State may, prior to the 1st day of April, vary, by an act of its Legislature, the respective quotas imposed by this act on its several counties or districts, so as more equally and equitably to apportion the tax hereby imposed. Each State may pay its quota into the Treasury of the United States, and thereon shall be entitled to a deduction of fifteen per centum, if paid before the first day of March, 1814, and of ten per centum if paid before the first day of May in the same year, &c.]

Mr. POST moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of Ways and Means. His view was to obtain a different apportionment of the tax in the State of New York.

The question on this motion was decided in the negative by yeas and nays, as follows: For recommitment, 54; against it, 100.

Mr. WHEATON then moved to postpone the bill to the first Monday in December next, for reasons which he assigned.

The motion was decided in the negative by nearly the same majority as on the last vote.

The question was then stated on the passage of the bill.

Mr. BRIGHAM.—I will ask the indulgence of the House, while I make a few remarks on the question now under consideration; and assign some reasons for the vote which I shall give on this bill. Sir, there is an importance and consequence in this direct tax, which will affect, not only my constituents, but the people of the United States, very sensibly. The object of this bill is, to take from the pockets of our constituents the profits of their industry, to the amount of three millions of dollars, to enable the constituted authorities to prosecute the war more rapidly, that is, to conquer and take the Canadas with more despatch.

Sir, the war in which the country is involved, has lost its popularity, if it ever had any, by the constant defeats and disasters which have attended it. I have uniformly been opposed to the war, and, of course, am opposed to this tax, and to all the measures which have for their object the continuance of it.

Sir, I was not an accessary before the fact, nor shall I be an accessary after the fact; the people, I know, are anxious for peace, and are opposed to the taxes for the continuance of the war. Some have flattered themselves that Congress, at the present session, would do something to facilitate and hasten the restoration of peace, but those will be disappointed; instead of peace, they must have taxes. Sir, we are not assembled to congratulate each other on the return of peace; no, we are assembled under an act of the 12th Congress, who declared war, and to do their work, a work which they dare not do, or did not choose to do—to tax the whole world—that is, to lay this whole community under contribution, to enable the constituted authorities to prosecute an unpromising and hopeless war; and now we, who are recently intrusted with the welfare and the peace of this great commonwealth, are called on to impose a heavy tax on this people, and to augment the miseries and increase the burdens of our constituents to satisfy the immense exigencies of an offensive war, a war of conquest. Sir, we have already, by the war, deprived many of our fellow-citizens of the ordinary comforts of life, and destroyed the future prospects of a great portion of the community; and shall we now demand their money, to continue a war so distressing? Sir, I am aware that it may be unpopular with the friends of the war to say anything in opposition to it; but it is difficult for me to say anything for or against the proposition now under consideration, without adverting to the object to which the money shall be applied, if the tax shall be laid, and the money collected. It is said money is wanted to pay our debts; true, it is, that the country is involved in debt, and we have a large Military Establishment, a numerous army have been enlisted, and great expenses have been incurred, and to execute their contracts, the Government have been obliged to negotiate loans to an unexampled amount, and to pay an extravagant interest; and now we must demand, as well of those who are opposed to the war, as of those who are its advocates, to contribute to its support and continuance. No, sir; abandon the war, restore peace to the country, and then, those who are opposed to the present measures will do whatever is reasonable and just to discharge the public debt, and to support the credit of the nation.

Sir, those who are opposed to the war, will be opposed to this tax, and, for myself, I believe there are more than one half of the white free-men within the United States who are opposed to the continuance of the war; the citizens of the Eastern States are induced, neither by interest or honor, to give countenance to the present system of warfare, they consider it destructive of the best interests of the country, and threatening the loss of their liberties; but, although they are impoverished and distressed by the measures of their own Government, they are not subdued; they are not so beggared and debased as voluntarily to stretch out their necks to receive this yoke of war tax.

The majority of the people in the State which I have the honor to represent, in part, never will do anything to support and protract the war, but what the Constitution and laws of their country oblige them to do; and, for this plain reason, they are Americans, they love liberty, and hate oppression, and cannot consent to be the instruments of their own destruction; and they see nothing which the Government can give as an equivalent or in exchange for the money which will be taken by this tax, either in right, in privilege, in protection, or honor; therefore, they will view it oppressive.

Sir, in my opinion, it is incumbent on the friends of the war and those who are desirous of taxing the people to enable the Administration to continue it, to show to this House the necessity of it, and the advantages to be derived from it—for if this war is unnecessary, as I think it is, then, is it not correct to say, that the authors of it are mediately and in effect the executioners of those men who have been urged, and induced into the field by the temptation of high wages and bounty, and there fallen a sacrifice. Sir, the barren soil of the Canadas has been stained with the blood of Americans, and is there no man or body of men, who are responsible for this effusion of human blood? The first blood which was ever shed, as we are told by high authority, cried from the ground against the wretch who occasioned it. I do not mean by this, to say that no war can be justified, but I mean this, that no war or shedding of blood can be justified but from necessity, and that all other wars are forbidden by reason, morality, and religion.

Sir, there is another and sufficient reason in my opinion, why this tax ought not to be imposed on the people of the United States to enable the constituted authorities to carry on this war; namely, that it was declared not only hastily, and without preparation, but under a misapprehension of the state of facts in our foreign relations; for, if the Berlin and Milan decrees were not repealed until the 28th of April 1811, about which there is no question, then it is clear to my mind that the note of the Duke of Cadore of the 5th of August 1810, never was designed to be a repeal of these decrees; then the proclamation of the President of the 2d of November, 1810, ought not to have been issued; the non-importation law of the 2d of March, 1811, ought not to have been passed, and Congress ought not have declared war, on the memorable and ever to be lamented 18th day of June 1812, and now ought not to impose this heavy tax on the people of the United States to support it. In relation to these decrees, it is very evident that the President and the majority of Congress, have been deceived by the arts and cunning of the French Government, and have been cheated into a war with the Government of Great Britain, much to the gratification of the great Napoleon.

Sir, I do not mean by this to impeach the motives, nor to treat the constituted authorities with disrespect, but I believe in my conscience that they have adopted a policy by mistake, or design, which, if persisted in, will be fatal to these United States. Sir, I am willing that justice should be done to those who hold the destinies of this nation. Yes, sir, I wish impartial justice may be done them.

In the meantime I will be just to myself and faithful to my constituents, who are opposed to this war, and are anxious for peace. Sir, if you ask what a solitary individual can do to put a period to the existing calamities, the answer is, when a question of the character now before the House is presented for his negative, or his affirmative, he can say, no. It has been said, and that very correctly, if you intend men shall behave well, you must take away the temptation to do ill. So in the present case—if you are desirous of peace, you must withhold from those who delight in war the means to prosecute it. There is no treason in saying no. And when the question is propounded, whether my constituents shall be impoverished and distressed with the burden of taxes, to support a destructive war, and which in my opinion threatens a dissolution of the Union, I shall say no.

Sir, the proposed taxes are to enable the constituted authorities to support an army, farther to invade the Canadas, and to wrest from the hands of a foreign Power the property and jurisdiction of that region; and success in this enterprise, we all know, must drive the innocent to destruction, which ought, if possible, to be avoided. The laws of humanity and justice forbid it. The war now rests on the subject of impressment, and must be prolonged and maintained to secure the rights of American seamen. Sir, the two Governments are not at issue on this fact. The British Government claim no right to impress American seamen. She disclaims it; and professedly claims no right but to the services of her own men in time of war—a right which we in theory admit; and although abuses have taken place in the exercise of this right, which has been cause of complaint, yet it never was thought just cause of war, until the days of modern policy. In the treaty negotiated by Mr. Monroe, it was reserved for future adjustment. In the treaty made with Mr. Erskine, under the Administration of Mr. Madison, which seemed to gladden the hearts of all parties, the impressment of seamen was not taken into the account. Sir, I see no connexion between the continuance of this war and seamen's rights. We shall find no seamen's rights in the cold region of the Canadas—we have found nothing there but disaster; and it is time to pause, and to abandon this war; and if we are desirous of peace, go directly to the object, and propose a general armistice—negotiate an honorable peace, which will supersede the necessity of these taxes, and gladden the hearts of this great people, and liberate the oppressed.

Mr. CULPEPER addressed the Chair as follows:

Sir: As the vote is to be recorded which I shall give upon this and sundry other bills connected with it, as component parts of one great system of internal tax—a system deeply affecting the best interests of my country—I rise to explain to this House some of the reasons which govern me in the course I expect to pursue. I am anxious to see this session closed, and should not trouble the House with any remarks at present, were it not for certain attempts which have been made to forestall my proceeding upon this subject. I allude to several publications in the newspapers, stating that I had pledged myself to my constituents to support the war, to vote for taxes. Sir, my constituents required no such pledge; four-fifths of them believe with me, that, notwithstanding the encroachments of England and France, we were the most happy, free, and prosperous nation on the globe; that we owed to the pacific policy of our Government, that happiness which astonished the world; that a perseverance in this pacific course would have preserved to us a great portion of that happiness and prosperity which war and its dire effects have deprived us of; and, therefore, war is at all times, and especially in this agitated state of the world, to be deprecated as the greatest of evils.

Sir, I am not pledged by my promise to support or oppose any party in this House or country; or to vote for or against any measure now before the House, or which may come before it. But I am pledged to meet every subject fairly, to weigh them impartially, and vote on every question which comes before me, in the way that I deem most likely to promote the welfare of my country, and preserve to me an approving conscience. And this promise I am determined to perform while I am honored with a seat in this House, and blessed with the exercise of my feeble powers. With this determination I do, as every man, solicitous to preserve happiness to himself, his country, and his posterity, should do. I ask, what are we called on to make this great sacrifice for; for what reasons are we now required to part from the good old republican doctrine of '97, '98, and '99, and by our vote sanction this practice, this system which at that time was declared to be subversive of our liberties, and our republican Constitution, by the very men who now call on us to support this system? To this we are told that war makes taxes necessary; that we must have money to support the war, and maintain public credit. And an honorable gentleman from Kentucky told us the other day that every man who, either directly or indirectly voted for war, and does not now vote for taxes to support the war, must be damned by his own conscience; that his constituents will certainly damn him, and if mercy does not prevent it, his Maker will more than damn him.

Be it so, sir, since gentlemen will have it; none of these things move me; I have neither directly nor indirectly voted for war. I am, therefore, at liberty to ask, and I avail myself of the privilege of asking, what good has the war in which we are engaged done us? what advantage have we obtained by it? what are the objects of the war? and are we likely to obtain our objects by voting for taxes? For although I admit that we must pay a price for the benefit of living in society, that we must relinquish a share of our natural liberty, and part with some of our property to secure the remainder; yet I contend that when individuals enter into society, it is for the mutual benefit of each other and of the community. That when a nation intrusts to a number of persons the right of levying war and imposing taxes, it is to enable them the better to repel foreign invasion, and maintain domestic tranquillity; and, therefore, Legislators should exercise that important trust with prudence, and not hastily involve the nation in war; and, by aiming at a temporary good, or the accomplishment of some favorite object, strike at the fundamental principles on which the happiness and liberty of the nation rest; and make a breach at which tyranny, oppression, poverty, and ruin, may one day enter. The question recurs, what good has the war done? To this question, I presume every gentleman in the House will answer we have derived no benefit from the war. Neither our happiness, our liberty, our property, or our honor, is increased or better secured. What, then, are the objects of this war? To obtain information upon this subject, I have examined the report of the Committee of Foreign Relations to the second session of the twelfth Congress, in which report I find these words:

"That the Orders in Council should be repealed, and that our flag should protect our seamen, were the only indispensable conditions insisted on; that it happened, that almost on the same day on which the United States, after having been worn out with accumulated wrongs, had resorted to the last and only remaining honorable alternative in support of their rights, the British Government had repealed conditionally its Orders in Council. That measure was unexpected; but, conditional as it was, it was admitted as having removed a great obstacle to accommodation. The other remained—the practice of impressment. Your committee consider it the duty of this House to explain to its constituents the remaining cause of controversy, the precise nature of that cause, and the high obligation which it imposes."

From what has been stated, it appears that however great the sensibility to other wrongs, the impressment of our seamen was that alone which prevented an armistice, and in all probability an accommodation. From this report it appears that one of the two causes of war, the Orders in Council, was removed almost on the same day in which the United States resorted to war, and before the British Government could possibly hear of our declaration of war. If, then, sir, this remaining complaint is that alone which prevented an accommodation, it is of the utmost importance to understand its precise nature and extent, and how far it is to be considered an obstacle in future to accommodations, and examine our prospects of success; for, although the object may be desirable, it is bad policy to contend for it, and spill our blood, and spend our money, without a prospect of success. What, then, is the precise extent of this remaining cause of war? I have examined the President's Message to Congress at the commencement of this session, and I find it contains what follows:

"With respect to the important question of impressment, on which the war so essentially turns, a search for, or seizure of British persons or property on board neutral vessels on the high seas, is not a belligerent right derived from the laws of nations; and it is obvious that no visit, or search, or use of force for any purpose on board the vessels of one independent Power, on the high seas, can in war or peace be sanctioned by the laws or authority of another."

Now, sir, if I understand this passage in the Message, free ships shall make free goods, or in other words, the flag shall cover and protect the property. If this is our demand, we may fight eternally, for I have no idea that the maritime Powers of Europe, especially the British, will ever concede this point. But if it is only proposed to protect none but American seamen, I am not prepared to say the war is unjust, for I have believed for several years we have had great cause to complain of the conduct of both the British and French Governments, and if war was desirable, we could have found a pretext for war with both England and France. And when such regulations are made as shall confine the navigation of our ships of war and merchant vessels to American seamen, and foreigners are excluded, if the British or any other nation will continue to enter by force, and take our seamen from on board of our vessels, I shall consider it the duty of every man in the country to resist this practice; and, if necessary, to fight as long as we have men and money and a reasonable prospect of success; but I do not consider it a crime for a nation or an individual to reclaim its own; and I am unwilling to jeopardize our republican institutions, and spill our blood and strain our credit to protect foreigners. The important question is, are we likely to attain our object? To solve this question, let us examine the progress and effects of the war. It has been declared more than one year, and has increased our annual expenses from $10,000,000 to nearly $40,000,000. In 1806 our expenses were $10,000,000; in 1813, the Secretary of the Treasury reports that $29,230,000 are necessary to carry on the war, and support the Government the last nine months of the present year. It has also diminished our revenue from near eighteen millions to little more than five millions. In 1803, the receipts into the Treasury amounted to eleven millions of dollars; in 1804, to eleven and a half millions; in 1805, to thirteen millions; in 1806, to fifteen millions; in 1807, to near sixteen millions; and in 1808, to near eighteen millions, and rapidly increasing. From that period, our restrictive system, which eventuated in war, has affected our revenue, which has been gradually decreasing, and the Secretary estimates the probable amount of revenue from the ordinary sources, including double duties, which have been recently laid on goods imported, at $5,800,000 for the present year, and this small sum is uncertain. If, then, sir, the war has been carried on for more than twelve months, and has increased our expenses near thirty millions of dollars, and decreased our revenue twelve millions, and we have not advanced one step towards the attainment of our object, and I trust gentlemen will admit we have not, I ask, have we any reason to expect that by voting for taxes we shall attain it? I have no expectation, nor do I desire to drive the majority from the stand they have made; from the strong ground they have taken; but really, sir, this premature, this ill-advised, this miserably conducted war, so much resembles the seven ill-favored and lean-fleshed kine in Pharaoh's dream, which did eat up the seven well-favored and fat kine, that I cannot vote to tax my constituents, and my country, to support a war for the protection of seamen, until I have better reason to believe such will be the result of the present contest.

Mr. NELSON moved to recommit the bill to the Committee of the Whole for the purpose of amendment in respect to the Virginia apportionment.—Negatived.

The question on the passage of the bill was then decided in the affirmative—yeas 97, nays 70, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

FRIDAY, July 9.

On motion of Mr. SEYBERT,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to have printed, during the ensuing recess of Congress, for the use of this House, one thousand copies of the digest which was authorized to be made in pursuance of the joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress, entitled "A resolution directing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause to be made a statement of the number, situation, and value, of the arts and manufactures of the United States."

The bill from the Senate for the relief of the owners of the vessels Amazon, Good Friends, and United States, and their cargoes, (the Amelia Island cases,) was twice read and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The bill from the Senate making an appropriation for completing the Senate Chamber and repairing the north wing of the Capitol, was twice read and committed.

The bill from the Senate providing for the further defence of the ports and harbors of the United States, (authorizing the purchase and use of hulks, &c.,) was twice read and referred to the Military Committee.

The amendment of the Senate to the bill to reward the officers and crew of the sloop of war Hornet, (going to include Captain Elliott, &c., on the Lakes,) went through a Committee of the Whole, and was subsequently agreed to by the House.

CONDUCT OF THE WAR.

Mr. BRADLEY rose, and said that in offering to the House the resolution which he was about to submit for their consideration, he hoped he should be pardoned any agitation he might betray upon a subject which had given him peculiar anxiety, and which was vitally interesting to his native State, which he had the honor to represent.

He said, he need not now inform the House with what devoted eagerness the people of that State engaged in the prosecution of the present war, after it was declared by the constituted authorities of the nation. It was sufficiently obvious, from the number of troops which had enlisted from that State into the armies of the Union, and from the circumstance that until the enlistments could be completed, she not only poured forth her militia but levied a tax upon her hardy and industrious citizens at home, in order to pay an increase of wages, which she gratuitously gave to those who marched in obedience to the call of their country. This, said Mr. B., was not done for the mere purpose of defence, but with a proud and confident view to aid in the attack and conquest of Canada, which he was not ashamed to say was one of the ultimate objects of his countrymen—an object rendered dear to them by the recollections of other times; it was the theatre of their former glory; and he could almost say that its occupation was the first and last wish of their souls. It was also the avowed object of the Government, and he would believe, notwithstanding certain surmises which had lately reached him, that it was the wish of the great body of the American people. He was not insensible to the changes which time and reverses might produce, but it was his unalterable opinion, that when the present war was declared, there was an almost universal expectation among the people that it would be conducted in a manner commensurate with the increased population and power of the country. Sir, said he, they did expect and they had a right to expect, that after twelve months, not of mere preparation, but of downright actual warfare, and in a contest between a population of seven millions and another of one fourteenth part that number, victory was not to be a matter of question. But they have been cruelly disappointed—instead of victory they have met with nothing but defeat, or if success has perched upon our unsteady standard, it has been evanescent, unsupported, and unimproved. Instead of that harmony and co-operation which can alone insure success, we behold division and partial and unconnected enterprise. Instead of the giant with strong and rapid arm seizing or crushing his puny adversary, we behold his awkward movements and fitful starts; while the pigmy with his sling buries the maddening and deadly pebble in his brain. Instead of shouts of triumph resounding through the country, and making even the walls of this Capitol to vibrate with joy, almost every paper which is daily laid upon our tables teems with some new tale of disaster and disgrace. Mr. B. said, he could not find language to describe the melancholy which pressed upon his soul when he reflected upon the contrast; he could not depict the humiliating mortification which he felt in being obliged, as he then was, to rise and discharge the duty of moving an inquiry into the causes of these things; but he knew it to be a duty imperative and unavoidable, and without the performance of which he should never again dare to look his constituents in the face. They expected it from their Representatives, and it was morally certain that the country expected from the House to inquire into the causes, and if possible apply the remedy of the evils which surrounded them. If this is not done, said he, if the massacre of our soldiers slaughtered or captured in detail, if the cloud of gloom and despondency which is settling upon the country cannot arouse us, then are we lost, indeed. We may then proceed and apply ourselves to revenue and impose taxes, which will operate after the national spirit is exhausted, and rely upon missions until the national character is sunk even beneath negotiation. Considering the vast sums of money which had already been expended; the number of men which it was obvious must be in the public service to consume so great an expenditure; and, above all, the personal courage displayed by the troops in almost every engagement; he could not bring himself to believe that the cause of our misfortunes was now to be found in the want of strength or resources in the country, or of valor in the soldiers. It must be elsewhere; and, perhaps, some gentlemen would suppose that in starting and pursuing this inquiry, he was in danger of laying it at the door of the present Administration. If such were the case, he could assure those gentlemen that no administration—no man, or body of men, was dearer to him than his country. But he saw no necessity for the supposition, that the Executive, the commander-in-chief, or the soldier, was in fault. The cause of evil might be somewhere else; he did not pretend to say where; indeed, he did not know; but this he did know, that, wherever it was, it ought to be ferreted out and exposed to the eyes of the nation; and so far as it lay in the power of that House, he confidently trusted that this would be done, and the army restored to sanity, and the country to its reputation.

Mr. B. declared himself sufficiently sensible that the resolution which he was about to submit to the House was presented at a late period in the session; but he was also sensible of the old proverb, that it was never too late to do good; and, in his opinion, the remnant of time could not be employed in a manner more useful to the Republic, more grateful to the people, and more satisfactory to themselves, than in the appointment of a committee, which, without embarrassing or retarding the other public business, could at least commence the investigation to which he had endeavored to call the attention of the House. With this view he submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the causes which have led to the multiplied failures of the arms of the United States on our Western and Northwestern frontier, and that the committee be authorized to send for persons and papers.

The House having agreed to consider the resolution—

Mr. HOPKINS, of Kentucky, made some observations, not distinctly heard, owing to the distance of the reporter from his seat. He was, however, in favor of a full inquiry into all the disasters which had occurred; but appeared to conceive the present moment to be unseasonable, on account of the particular circumstances of the country and the approaching termination of the session. On a future occasion, and under different circumstances, he appeared disposed to give it his full support.

Mr. SEYBERT was opposed to the adoption of the resolution, for several reasons. It proposed to put it in the power of a committee of this House to send for persons and papers relative to the inquiry. Who were the persons whom it was thus proposed to send for during the present Summer? Almost every officer of the army. It appeared to Mr. S. that the resolution was entirely out of time, although he concurred in the propriety of the proposed inquiry if it were practicable. It was an inquiry, moreover, wholly incompatible with present circumstances, as it would consume many months, and must at last be inefficient and the result inconclusive.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said it did seem to him that the resolution now under consideration was the most impolitic in relation to the situation of the country and of the national affairs, that ever was submitted to Congress. At a session limited, according to every calculation, to two weeks' further duration, we are called upon to enter into an inquiry, and to send for persons and papers relative to it, which would probably consume several months. I concur most heartily in the sentiment, that it is not only the right, but the duty of Congress, if they discover any gross and manifest mismanagement of the arms of the country, to institute an inquiry into the circumstances, as they did many years ago in the case of St. Clair's defeat. But a reference to the circumstances of the country would prove that such an inquiry, at this moment, was neither expedient or practicable. An inquiry presupposes deliberation, candid deliberation and decision. Is it to be expected that an inquiry can be set on foot, and the result thereof reported to the House at the present session? Will you condemn your officers unheard? I say your officers, for I understood the mover of the resolution not to implicate any person at the seat of Government, nor to propose to extend the inquiry further than into the mismanagement of the arms in the hands of our brave soldiery on the frontiers. If persons and papers relative to the inquiry were to be sent for, what would be the situation of our army in relation to the enemy? The Massachusetts memorialists would gain their prayer in one essential particular; our armies would not only return within our own limits, but would be absolutely driven from the frontier and disbanded. The army would be a caput mortuum; for all its officers, from major-generals to subalterns, would be withdrawn.

Besides, sir, the resolution speaks of repeated failures of our arms in the West and Northwest. It assumes a fact which, independent of its scope, I do not know to be true. What failures in the West does the gentleman allude to? Was there a failure of our arms at Fort Meigs? A detachment of our force was indeed cut off; but in relation to the main object of the enemy's expedition against that fort, it was a complete failure of the arms of the enemy. To what, then, does the gentleman refer in speaking of the repeated failures of our arms in the West? That they have failed, lamentably failed, in several instances, is too true, but it is equally so, that it was not owing to any want of courage or subordination on the part of the soldiery. If they had been headed by men as competent to command them as they were worthy of competent commanders, they would never have failed to be victorious. I would not condemn any man unheard, not even him [meaning General Hull] against whom the sentiment of execration is unanimous in this House and the nation, as far as my knowledge extends. Audi alteram partem. I would hear both sides before I would decide.

JULY, 1813.

Conduct of the War.

H. OF R.

Shall the proposed committee sit during the recess? Sir, it would be better at once to disband the army. The gentleman's resolution ought to embrace yet another proposition, and that is, to substitute other officers for those to be recalled to attend the committee. When the campaign shall have ended, I will concur heartily in the expediency of such an inquiry, and the very agitation of this proposition will prove a sufficient stimulus to our army. We have been informed of the indisposition of the Commander-in-chief of the Northern army, and, in consequence of this and other causes, he is to be stationed at Albany. Sir, have we no General competent to command that army? One of the failures, at least, embraced in the proposed inquiry, has been, or is, a subject of military inquiry. Does the gentleman wish to take it out of such hands? Will the House throw its weight into the scale against an individual in relation to whom there has existed for several months so general a prejudice and disgust? I know not, sir, what would be the situation of Fort Meigs, if the gentleman should withdraw the officers from that post and bring them before the House; for, if our accounts are correct, that place is again besieged. I fear, sir, that this resolution, at the present moment, will be fraught with great evil, and will produce no good whatever; for the terms of the resolution forbid the idea of an ex parte inquiry, and it would be destruction to the Army at this moment to withdraw the officers whose presence would be necessary to a due examination of the matter. This resolution is moved, too, in the face of the fact that the members are daily obtaining leave of absence. We have already prolonged the session beyond the period which public opinion had assigned for its duration. We have consumed time, no one can tell how or wherefore, and the important business which we were called here to act upon is not yet transacted. In such a state of things, how could we act correctly on a proposition like this during the session? And, sir, I have no idea of clothing a committee of the House during the recess with the powers with which this resolution proposes to invest them. If the motion be pressed, I must vote against it, though I had rather it should be postponed.

Mr. TAYLOR remarked that the resolution embraced a matter of much importance, on which the House ought not to act without due reflection and mature consideration. He was fully persuaded that it had been submitted from pure and patriotic motives, and there were many considerations in favor of it; but, for himself, he was not now prepared to act on it, and therefore moved that it lie on the table.

Mr. FINDLEY stated that in 1790 an expedition, commanded by Colonel Harmer, composed of his own regiment and detachments of militia from the neighboring States, including Pennsylvania, having been carried against the Indian towns and totally defeated, Congress provided a more numerous army of enlisted levies, which composed the expedition commanded by General St. Clair, in 1791, against the Indian towns. This expedition also was not only defeated, but so completely destroyed, that a new and more permanent army had to be raised and organized, the accomplishment of which was very much discouraged by such repeated and destructive defeats. In order, as far as possible, to prevent the recurrence again of such misfortunes, by means of any defect in the intended organization of a new army, a committee was appointed to inquire into the causes of the failure of that unfortunate expedition. The committee, towards the close of the session, accompanied a concise report with a great mass of testimony, but the inquiry not being deemed sufficiently full, the subject was recommitted to a committee, composed of the same members, the next session, who sat and continued their inquiry till near the close of that session also, when they made another concise report, explaining and confirming the former one, supported by much new testimony. The session being near a close, the proceedings were not published, but the testimony and the books of information given in by the parties principally interested are still in possession of the House. There was, as is the case in all unfortunate expeditions, strong prepossession against the commander. By the inquiry, the grounds of these were removed, and the causes found principally to arise from the general plan, the construction of the army, the delay and insufficiency of supplies of all sorts, badness of the gunpowder, &c.

Mr. F. said that, having been a member of that committee of inquiry during its continuance, and the only member now in this House that was so, induced him to be more particular on that subject. He had long regretted the neglect to publish the proceedings of that committee, as similar causes might thereby have been prevented, which may have had their influence in producing some of the failures which are now the object of the proposed inquiry, or may have on future expeditions. He was in favor of the proposed inquiry, to which he thinks the former inquiry a suitable precedent, while, at the same time, it demonstrates that it cannot be gone into at the present session, nor at any time during the active period of a campaign, because not only all the principal officers concerned in the subjects of inquiry, but all such as either the committee or the parties may judge necessary for witnesses, must attend. From former examples of such inquiries on different subjects, it is probable that the proposed inquiry may require the attention of the committee during a pretty long session, and it is evident, that, in order that the parties concerned may attend, this must be during a Winter session. Mention having been made of a committee to sit and act during the recess of Congress, Mr. F. said he had doubts of the propriety of a committee continuing to act during the recess of Congress. There was, indeed, one example. A committee was authorized to sit during a long recess to take testimony, &c., for an impeachment. When, at much expense and much arduous labor, the propositions were made, the Senate decided that the case was not impeachable. By the inviolable practice of the House, every session appoints its own committees de novo, therefore, though we are of the same Congress, yet we cannot, during this session, appoint a committee for the next. Were it not for this, I would not object to vote for a committee now. I am, however, well disposed to vote for it as soon as such an inquiry is practicable.

Mr. GHOLSON said it would be difficult for him to express the emotions he felt at the introduction of this resolution by the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. BRADLEY.) The gentleman, so anxious to-day for the prosecution of the war, yesterday voted against the direct tax which was intended to support the war—[Here Mr. TAYLOR from New York called Mr. G. to order, and it was alleged by him, and decided by the SPEAKER that the motives of the gentleman from Vermont (Mr. BRADLEY) could not be called in question.] Mr. G. said he did not intend to question the motives of the gentleman from Vermont; but he presumed, without saying how the gentleman voted on the direct tax, he might be permitted to say, that that tax was designed as the basis of the public credit, which credit was the support of the war for the success of which the gentleman from Vermont now appears so solicitous. Mr. G., however, waived this view of the subject, and observed that he considered it his bounden duty to repel an insinuation which the gentleman from Vermont had made against the Executive. And in repelling such insinuation, sir, said Mr. G., I am influenced altogether by a sense of justice; for neither myself or any of my kindred have the least interest whatever in "the loaves and fishes" that are distributed by the President. The gentleman from Vermont has said or intimated that the cause of the failures of our armies on the Northern and Northwestern frontiers, lies higher than in the armies themselves—leaving us to infer that the cause lies with the Executive. Sir, I most pointedly deny this charge, thus indirectly made, and I appeal to the facts. I hazard nothing, sir, in affirming, and whenever the investigation shall be made, it will manifestly appear, that, in every instance of failure, the means provided by the Government have been ample and abundant. That they have been fully and more than sufficient for the accomplishment of the object in view. A recurrence for one moment to the history of the several campaigns, will show that the Executive have not been neglectful of their duty. That they have always provided sufficient force and competent means to insure success in their enterprises, if that force and those means had been properly combined and directed by the officers to whose management they were confided. If we analyze the progress of the war, and examine into the disasters that have occurred, the results will be obvious. Beginning with Hull's surrender, will any gentleman say that the Executive is in any wise chargeable with that most disgraceful transaction? That General was provided with everything for his defence. Of this no one can doubt.

Will the President be charged with the defeat of Van Rensselaer, who had force enough, if he had called it into action, to have demolished the enemy: but who relied on militia, in whom it was notorious no confidence could be reposed for service in the enemy's territory, and this, too, when there was a brigade of regulars perfectly within his command and at his disposal? I will not say, sir, that this was—[Here the SPEAKER observed that Mr. G. was taking too wide a range of debate, on the mere question of postponement; and Mr. G. took his seat.]

Mr. BRADLEY (who was precluded from debating the question at large by the Speaker's decision that it was improper on this motion) observed, that he perceived that several gentlemen had supposed his intention to be, to produce a state of things which had never entered into his contemplation. It was not his intention to go into a full inquiry at the present session, but merely to proceed as far as possible at this time, and satisfy the just wishes of his constituents. Because everything could not be done at the present session, was no reason that nothing should be done. So far from having any disposition to cramp the operations of the army, he was anxious to accelerate them. The effect of laying the resolution on the table would be still further to waste the time which some gentlemen seem to think too short for inquiry. Not a moment ought to be lost in commencing the good work, if the greatest argument which could be urged against it was, as it appeared to be, the want of time. The almost dying expression of the lamented Pike was, that the face of the war ought to be changed; which can only be done by the adoption of measures by Congress calculated to produce this effect. It seemed it was not now in order to reply to the observations that had been made as to the motives which had induced him to make this motion; if he were permitted he should reply. He hoped no postponement would take place. If the committee, on proceeding to an inquiry, should find it difficult or impracticable, they could so report to the House.

Mr. FARROW hoped the resolution would not lie on the table. He understood it sufficiently, and it was so short and specific that it might readily be understood by any gentleman on hearing it read. The nation required that such an inquiry should be had; and if the inquiry could not be made at the present session, it might at least be begun.

Mr. BABB avowed his opinion that the disasters our arms had incurred had been such as to demand an inquiry at the hands of the House. He was opposed to the motion, not because the inquiry ought not to be made, but because it could not be made at the present session. The inquiry could not be completed during the session; and the pendency of such an inquiry might have the effect to supersede military inquiry or trial, as he recollected it had done once before (in the case of General Wilkinson.) At the next session he hoped there would be no indisposition to make the inquiry on any side of the House. He, therefore, hoped the gentleman would consent to withdraw his motion, or to postpone it to December next.

Mr. BRADLEY declining to withdraw the motion—

The question was taken on laying it on the table and decided as follows: For laying it on the table 76, against it 67.

A motion having been made to print the resolve, was negatived, 76 to 65.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the whole House, to whom was committed the bill for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties, and the other tax bills; and, after some time spent therein the Committee rose and reported the bill laying duties on carriages for the conveyance of persons, with amendments, and asked leave to sit again on the residue of the said bills; which was granted.

The amendments were then read and concurred in by the House, except two of the said amendments, which were disagreed to.

A motion was made by Mr. TAYLOR, further to amend the bill by adding to the end of the proviso in the first section, the words, "or in the opinion of the collector of a value not exceeding fifty dollars," and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

Another motion was then made by Mr. TAYLOR, further to amend the bill by striking out the words "three dollars," in the first section, and to insert "two dollars."

Mr. CLOPTON.—Mr. Speaker: I find myself under the necessity of addressing you and the House upon this occasion. It is really disagreeable to me to trouble you at all, and nothing but the peculiar situation in which I stand, could induce me to it. This renders it a duty I owe myself, to state my reasons for the vote which I shall give upon the bill before you. Believing, as I do, after much reflection upon the subject, that the tax proposed to be raised by the bill is of the nature of a direct tax, I cannot conscientiously vote for it, because the Constitution prohibits the laying of such a species of tax in the way proposed.

Having voted for the declaration of war, in vindication of the honor and the dignity, and the rights, and I may say, the independence too, of this nation, I hope it will not be imagined that I feel any sort of reluctance in supporting the war; that it will not be presumed, under these circumstances, that I am unwilling to furnish the supplies for carrying it on. Such a disposition (could I at this awful crisis in the affairs of our country entertain it) would indicate a degree of inconsistency, a sort of waywardness, a sort of whimsical inconstancy of mind which, I trust, will never enter into my composition—will never in any instance characterize my conduct. No, sir; it is from a regard to the sacred injunctions of the Constitution; it is from a regard to the solemn requirement of the oath I have taken to support the Constitution, that I am constrained to enter my dissent to the proposed tax. To satisfy the feelings of my own conscience, and to follow the decisions of my own judgment, are sacred obligations on my mind not to be dispensed with. I may regret, as I do very sincerely regret, that I am brought to decide on a branch of a system of taxation proposed in a way which that judgment deliberately and seriously consulted cannot reconcile to the Constitution; and, it is in no small degree that this regret is deepened and rendered the more poignant from the consideration that the course which I am thus constrained to take, runs in a line directly opposite to that which, I expect, will be taken by gentlemen with whom I have, with very few exceptions, always gone—with whom I have travelled, and travelled with pleasure, in the paths of legislation. But deep as this regret is, and even afflicting to my mind, it must give way to the superior consideration I have stated.

However, sir, even in respect to matters affording, as it would seem, but narrow ground for difference of opinion, experience teaches us that much difference of opinion often prevails. It is no cause for astonishment or surprise, therefore, that the judgment, which my mind has been able to form upon the question of constitutionality in relation to the proposed tax, should be so essentially different from that of other gentlemen. The frequency of such instances renders the circumstance such as not to be wondered at. Nor do I feel it to be of much, if of any consequence, in deciding upon this question, if I should be told, as perhaps I may be told, that this point has been already settled by the Supreme Court—that they have, by a solemn decision, established the constitutionality of this species of tax. Such decision (for I believe a decision upon the subject has been pronounced by that body) may, and no doubt has, settled the point, and established the principle for themselves; but until they become the arbiters of my conscience and the directors of my judgment, I shall deny that their decision has any binding force whatever upon my mind in deciding upon this question. I not only feel the disposition, but have formed the determination to judge for myself on such matters as are brought before me, and in respect to which I am called to act in the course of legislation, whatever opinions may have been pronounced by others under any character whatever, or in any department of the Government. At the same time I declare, sir, that neither this disposition nor this determination prevents me from entertaining a due respect for the characters, the talents, and the stations of the public functionaries, and for their opinions, on whatever subjects they may be pronounced; and this respect for their opinions will always induce me to examine, as minutely as my judgment is capable of examining, every case in which they may have pronounced a decision, which does not strike my mind as being correct, if I am called upon to act on such case: but nothing like a slavish indiscriminate assentation to such opinions, as so many political oracles or infallible expositions of the Constitution (if they relate to Constitutional questions,) shall ever sink me below the character of an independent Representative. To my conscience and to my country, and not to any select individuals, I am responsible for my conduct in this House. By the light, which it has pleased God in his beneficence to dispense to me, I feel it to be my duty to be directed. Dim as that light may be, it is that by which I am to be guided, and not by the light of another. However luminous the understanding; however exalted the station of any man, his opinions and decisions are not mine until my own mind becomes convinced of their propriety; much less can they be so while that is impressed with a belief that such opinions or decisions are erroneous or incorrect. With this impression on my mind, to assume them as my own opinions or decisions violates a duty I owe to my conscience, which requires that I should conform to its dictates—violates a duty I owe to my country, which requires that the votes I give here should be grounded on actual conviction of their propriety, resulting from a free, honest, unbiassed exercise of my best judgment. In the present instance, sir, I have endeavored so to exercise the best of my judgment, and to give to the subject now before us such an examination as I have mentioned; the result of which is a confirmed conviction that the tax in question cannot be constitutionally laid in the manner proposed, inasmuch as this examination has led to a conclusion, clear and unquestionable to my mind, that the tax proposed is a direct tax, according to the meaning of the Constitution.

I will now, sir, ask the indulgence of the House in order to submit a few observations upon this subject. In the investigation of it, Mr. Speaker, I consider it proper, first, to inquire whether the term direct has reference to the property on which the tax is laid: or whether it has reference to the owner or person in whose possession the property is, and who is chargeable with the payment of the tax. If it has reference to the property, on which the tax is laid, in that sense all taxes whatever would be direct taxes, (for all taxes are laid directly on the articles taxed,) and there would have been no necessity for introducing the word into the Constitution. The term, therefore, must have been applied, not to the property taxed, but solely to the owner or person in possession of the property on which the tax is laid, and who is immediately chargeable with the payment of it. I must, then, understand a direct tax, when the subject of it is an article of property, to stand opposed in character to what is called an indirect tax, in this respect, that it is laid directly on property, the owner or possessor of which is immediately chargeable with the payment of the tax, but by which no other person, whatever, is affected; whereas an indirect tax, as I understand it, although charged on the owner or person in possession at the time when the tax accrues, affects other persons also, though not charged with it as a tax, but who use or consume the property, or proceeds from it, and indirectly pay the tax, in the price of the article used or consumed; the term indirect, as characteristic of this species of tax, having reference to the person who uses or consumes the article. So that the terms direct and indirect, when applied to taxes, refer always to persons, and not to the things taxed; the tax in the one case falling solely upon, and being confined in its operations to, the person in possession at the time when it takes effect—in the other case passing to the consumer and operating ultimately on him: hence the consumer is said to be taxed indirectly in the latter instance—the proprietor to be taxed directly in the former instance.

JULY, 1813.

The Ways and Means.

H. OF R.

If we look at the clause in the Constitution which relates to direct taxes, we see that one sort of tax is specifically designated, and evidently, in my opinion, points out the character of every other species of it as applying wholly to the owner, or person immediately chargeable with the payment of the tax. That clause declares that "no capitation or other direct tax shall be laid, unless in proportion to the census or enumeration hereinbefore directed to be taken." Here, sir, it is plain, from the structure of the clause, that the capitation or poll tax is designated as a species of direct tax, to which all other direct taxes are similar in their character; that is to say, the quality of the tax, which renders the term direct an appropriate characteristic of it when applied to a poll tax, is similar to that of every other tax to which the same term is intended by the Constitution to be applied. The words "other direct taxes" immediately following the word "capitation," and being coupled with it in the sentence, prove clearly that there is an intimate connexion between them. They not only show that, besides the capitation tax, there are other species of taxes, likened in their nature and character to the capitation tax, but, also, that every tax so likened in its nature and character to the capitation is a direct tax, and consequently must, if laid at all, be laid in the same manner as a capitation tax is laid.

Now, sir, what is the nature and character of a capitation tax? The very term capitation proves the nature and character of the tax; proves it to be such a tax as does not, and cannot affect any person but the person immediately chargeable with the payment of the tax; for, who can be affected by it, or be chargeable with the payment of it, but the person on whose head it is laid, if he be a free man and not a minor? None, sir; and although in the capacity of a parent, a guardian, or a master, a person may be chargeable with the payment of a poll tax which is not laid upon his own head, yet this circumstance alters not the principle; on him only, as being the person immediately chargeable with the payment, does the tax operate in any manner whatever. In such a case, the person on whose head the tax is laid is merely a subject of it, and not otherwise affected by it.

The next step to be taken in the investigation of this subject is, to inquire whether the tax in question be similar in its nature and character to a capitation tax. If it be so, I contend the conclusion will be a fair and a just one, that it is a direct tax, and cannot be constitutionally laid in the manner proposed.

I have said, sir, and it is a position which seems to me too clear to be controverted, that a capitation or poll tax is a tax of such a nature and character that no person but the person immediately chargeable with the payment of the tax can be affected by it. Such being a peculiar characteristic quality of the capitation tax, I take it to be that which denominates it a direct tax; that, because it operates so directly and exclusively on the person charged with the payment of the tax, the framers of the Constitution intended to distinguish it by that appellation.

But, sir, is the proposed tax a tax of such a nature and character that no person but the person immediately chargeable with the payment of it can be affected by it? There are some propositions too clear and self-evident to require, or even admit of demonstration by regular process of reasoning. They are no sooner presented for consideration than the mind is stricken with a conviction of the truth of them. Such, I apprehend, is the proposition contained in the question just now propounded. For, can the truth of any proposition whatever, be more clearly demonstrated, by a course of reasoning, than the truth of this appears on the first presentation of it to the mind? I cannot conceive of any, sir. Can it be imagined that the tax laid upon a carriage can, in any manner whatever, affect any person but the owner, or person in possession, who is immediately charged with the payment of the tax? It seems to me, sir, that no mind, however ingenious and scrutinizing, can find out any way whatever by which such a tax can operate otherwise than solely on the owner or person in possession of the carriage, and immediately charged with the payment of the tax. That the operation of it is thus limited and confined, is as clear and self-evident as that a poll tax is so limited and confined in its operation. It is as clear and as self-evident as that a tax upon slaves, a tax upon houses, a tax upon land, is each so limited and confined in its operation.

If we recur to the bill passed by this House but a day or two ago for laying a direct tax, we shall see that slaves are not taxed therein by the head, but upon their valuation as so many articles of property. It is not a poll tax, then, as it respects them, any more than as it respects the other subjects of taxation enumerated in the bill; and why were they designated amongst those different species of property thus made the subjects of this tax, according to their valuation, and carriages not included in the enumeration? Can the human imagination discover any real substantial difference between these two subjects of taxation, considered as property? Can the human imagination mark any real distinction between a tax upon the one and a tax upon the other, as it affects, in either case, the owner or person immediately charged with the payment of the tax? It seems to me, sir, that he would find himself engaged in a very difficult task, who would undertake to find out any difference between them in that respect. They stand precisely in the same predicament, both in point of property, and in reference to the operation of the tax. As objects of property, they differ only in being different species of it. Dwelling-houses are also included in the list of property enumerated as the subjects of this tax; and to a tax on this species of property, a tax on carriages may, perhaps, be still more strikingly assimilated, inasmuch as they approach nearer towards each other in similarity of species.

I beg leave to notice an observation made by the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. BIBB,) in regard to a principle of discrimination, between direct and indirect taxes adopted by the Committee of Ways and Means. I understood that gentleman to state that the Committee considered carriages as articles of expense, and as such, it seems, it is proposed to lay a tax upon them, in the manner directed by this bill, at a rate affixed to each sort, as specified in the bill. To assume it, as a general principle, that articles of expense, merely as such, are the proper subjects of indirect taxation, will go farther, perhaps, than gentlemen who assume it are aware. It will go to include some which have been selected as subjects of the direct tax. Many slaves are employed in a manner to which the idea of expense may be as well attached, as that idea is attached to the employment of a carriage. They are often employed together, and alike, for the convenience of the owner; and may not the one as well as the other, then, be arranged under the head of expense? Can the mere circumstance that the carriage affords the means of convenience to the owner, determine that to be an article of expense; while, at the same time, the attending servant or waiter, who also affords means of convenience to the owner, is not to be considered as an object of expense? It seems to me, sir, that the mind must struggle hard, indeed, to make out a distinction in this respect, merely because there exists such a difference between them as to species of property, I cannot perceive, in this difference of species, any necessary separation of the one from the other, as to the idea of expense, although it may be true that sometimes the one may be more expensive than the other. Where is the connexion between the idea of a carriage and the idea of expense, which does not attach to the servant who drives the carriage? It would be difficult to prove the connexion as to the former, without proving it as to the latter. Domestic servants, too, when such are slaves, may be considered as standing in a similar predicament; and, if whatever administers to the ease, convenience, and even pleasure of the owner, as the use of a carriage may be deemed to do, ought, for that reason, to be arranged under the head of expense, for the same reason, the other description of property may be as fitly arranged under the same head. I cannot conceive, therefore, that the true principle of discrimination between a direct and indirect tax consists in a supposed association of the idea of the latter with the idea of expense, as the peculiar subject of its operation. I apprehend, rather, that it is to be found in the difference between their respective modes of operation. Upon the whole, sir, if, as I have endeavored to show, the proposed tax on carriages is precisely similar in its nature, in its character, and in its operation, to a poll or capitation tax, it must be a species of tax of the same denomination with the capitation tax. But everybody admits that the capitation tax is a direct tax, for it is expressly so called in the Constitution. I can, therefore, draw no other conclusion than this, that the proposed tax is also a direct tax; that it is equally as much so as a slave tax, a house tax, or a land tax.

Far from endeavoring by a forced construction of the Constitution to come to the conclusion that the proposed tax is a direct tax, and, therefore, not to be constitutionally laid in the manner intended by this bill, I have, on the contrary, almost endeavored to resist the convictions of my mind which have led to that conclusion, and to doubt the correctness of it, in order to reconcile the tax to the Constitution; because if I did believe it to be reconcilable to the Constitution, it would, in my opinion, be a very proper tax, and I should certainly vote for it, inasmuch as it is presumable that, generally, persons who own this species of property are well enabled to pay the tax. But no consideration of this sort can, or ought to induce me to mould the Constitution into a form to suit the tax, or, by a forced construction, which, to my mind, it will not bear, to reconcile it to the tax. If it be a defect in the Constitution, it is not for me to supply that defect. I am solemnly bound by the Constitution, as it is, and have no right to transcend the limits of it. Therefore, being under the impression of a strong belief that it does not authorize the laying of the tax as proposed in this bill, I cannot vote for it.

The question being taken on Mr. TAYLOR'S amendment it passed in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 52, as follows:

SATURDAY, July 10.

Mr. BENSON, from the Joint Committee appointed for the purpose, made a report, in part, of such business as, in the opinion of the committee, demands the attention of Congress at their present session; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. BENSON,

Resolved, That it be further referred to the Joint Committee of both Houses, to whom it is referred to consider and report when an adjournment of Congress may probably take place, also to consider and report as to the time when it will be advisable that Congress should again meet, after the close of the present session.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate "for the relief of Alexander Scott." The Committee rose and reported amendments, which were concurred in by the House, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to continue in force, for a limited time, certain acts authorizing corps of Rangers for the protection of the frontier of the United States, and making appropriations for the same. The bill was reported with amendments, which were concurred in by the House; and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day, which was subsequently done, and the bill passed.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate "supplementary to the acts heretofore passed upon the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization," and on the amendments proposed thereto by the Committee of Foreign Relations; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported their agreement to the said amendments; which were again read, and the first thereof concurred in, and the other two disagreed to by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. RUGGLES further to amend the bill, by adding a new section thereto; and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, to amend the bill by striking out the words "resident in the United States or the Territories thereof," in the second and third lines of the bill; and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The bill was then further amended, and the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for the widows and orphans of militia slain, and of militia disabled in the service of the United States. The bill was reported with amendments; which were concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the relief of Edwin T. Satterwhite. The bill was reported with an amendment; which was concurred in by the House, and the bill ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time on Monday next.

AMENDMENTS TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. J. G. JACKSON said he rose to call the attention of the House and of the nation to a resolution proposing amendments of the Constitution in some of its important features. Not, however, with a view to ask a decision on any question involved in its scope during the present session; but in order, that, at the commencement of the next session, it should be taken up, and if sanctioned by Congress be presented to the State Legislatures in time to be acted on at their Winter sessions; so that the nation might possess the benefits it contemplated as soon as practicable. In the mean time, the members of Congress and the States can deliberate on the subject, and be prepared then to pronounce their decision.

The first amendment, said Mr. J., proposes to authorize Congress to lay a tax on exports—a power he conceived indispensable to counteract the measures of foreign nations, who tax their exports to this country, and collect from that source a large revenue annually, which falls upon the consumer, and consequently is a tax on the United States. Mr. J. said he considered them a legitimate object of taxation, and the truest policy dictated the imposition of the tax, provided the inhibition were repealed which he proposed. He repeated, he would not now go into an examination of the general policy of the measure, or an inquiry into the reasons which induced the prohibition, but he would say that he believed that if the power existed there would be no necessity to resort to a system of internal taxes—a power which might be so guarded and exercised as to prevent any possible abuses which might be apprehended.

The other three amendments might be consolidated in one, (Mr. J. said,) were it not that he was unwilling to hazard either by an unnecessary connexion of it with the others; and if either was agreed to, it would be gaining something which he desired, even if all were not assented to. They propose authorizing Congress to make roads and canals, and to establish a national bank; the first of which were linked with the internal prosperity of the country, and the last almost indispensable to a due administration of the fiscal concerns of the nation. I am aware (said Mr. J.) that many persons in the nation believe that Congress are already clothed with these powers; but it is equally true that a great portion, also, deny the authority; whilst almost all, I believe, agree that it is proper and necessary to possess it. It is, therefore, the dictate of sound reason to reconcile these opinions by the express grant, in preference to resorting to construction and implication, which are always dangerous and may be rendered wholly unnecessary. I shall for the present content myself with submitting the resolution for consideration, in order that it may be laid on the table and printed, and at an early day of the next session it is my design to call for its adoption.

Mr. J. then read the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring, That the following articles be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, as amendments to the Constitution of the United States, each of which, when ratified by three-fourths of the said Legislatures, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as part of the said Constitution:

1. Congress shall have power to lay a tax or duty on articles exported from any State.
2. Congress shall have power to make roads in any State, with the consent of the State within which the same shall be made.
3. Congress shall have power to make canals in any State, with the consent of the State within which the same shall be made.
4. Congress shall have power to establish a National Bank, with branches thereof, in any State or Territory of the United States.

Mr. J. said, it was his intention to limit the power of taxing exports to an ad valorem duty on the articles exported, but he thought it best to present the simple proposition without details, which may be supplied hereafter.

The resolution was ordered to lie on the table.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

An engrossed bill laying duty on carriages for the conveyance of persons was read the third time, and on the question, "Shall the bill pass?" it passed in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 52, as follows:

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate "to relinquish the claims of the United States in certain goods, wares, and merchandise, captured by private armed vessels." The bill was reported without amendment, and the question then recurred that the bill be read the third time; when Mr. PIRKIN moved that it be indefinitely postponed; and the question being stated, and debate arising thereon, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, July 12.

Mr. DAWSON, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported the bill from the Senate "to incorporate a fire insurance company in the District of Columbia," without amendment.—Laid on the table.

Mr. BONV, from the select committee, reported a bill to authorize the laying out and opening a road from Shawanee town, on the Ohio, to the town of Kaskaskia, in the Illinois Territory; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

A motion made by Mr. BENSON, on Saturday, to direct the joint committee which was heretofore appointed to inquire and report as to the time when the House may adjourn, also to inquire when Congress may next meet, was taken up and agreed to.

An engrossed bill for the relief of Edwin T. Satterwhite was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill to provide for widows and orphans of militia slain, and of militia wounded in the actual service of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

The bill from the Senate, "for the relief of Alexander Scott," was read the third time, and passed, as amended.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, "for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties," with amendments, in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The House again resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole to whom was committed the bill for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties, and other tax bills, and after some spent therein the Committee rose and reported the bill laying a duty on salt imported into the United States, with amendments, and asked leave to sit again on the other subjects referred to them; which was granted.

Two Messages were received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, as follows:

NATURALIZATION.

The bill from the Senate supplementary to the several acts for establishing an uniform rule of naturalization, as amended by this House, was read a third time.

Mr. KENNEDY, after adverting to the clause which limits the privilege of naturalization to those aliens who have made a declaration of their intention to become citizens, to which limitation he objected, moved that the bill should lie on the table, to afford to him and others an opportunity more maturely to examine its provisions with that of existing laws.

Mr. ROBERTS, who conceived there was some inconsistency or indefiniteness in the provisions of the bill, suggested the propriety of referring it to a select committee.

Mr. KENNEDY consenting to waive his motion, in favor of recommitment—

The bill was recommitted to a select committee of three members—57 to 53.

CAPTURED PROPERTY.

The unfinished business was resumed, viz: the consideration of the bill "to relinquish the claims of the United States to certain goods, wares, and merchandise, captured by private armed vessels."

[This bill releases all right and claim accruing to the United States, under the non-importation laws, to goods, wares, or merchandise, the property of British subjects, shipped from British ports since the declaration of war, which, having been captured by private armed vessels on the high and open seas, have been libelled and claimed in the courts of the United States, in all cases where such goods, &c., shall be condemned as prize of war, for the benefit of the captors, &c.]

The question pending at the last adjournment, was on a motion for indefinite postponement. This question having been taken, was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 78.

Messrs. BENSON, FARROW, and SHEFFEY, opposed the passage of the bill; and Messrs. ROBERTS, RHEA, W. ALSTON, and WRIGHT, supported it.

The question on the passage of the bill was carried—79 to 64, as follows:

FOREIGN RELATIONS.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, made the following report :

The Committee of Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the President's Message of the 12th instant and the accompanying documents, report : That they have examined the Message and documents with all the attention their importance demands. Your committee will not indulge themselves in making the various observations which the interesting subjects brought under their consideration naturally suggest. The delay incident to such a course, connected with the lateness of the session and the advanced season of the year, forbid so wide a range; but they cannot abstain from remarking that, while the Message and documents furnish strong additional proof of the justice and necessity of the war, they also present powerful motives for the steady and vigorous prosecution of it, and the surest means of a safe and honorable peace. It can now no longer be doubted, that it was the pressure of our measures, combined with the determination of Congress to redress our wrongs by arms, and not the repeal of the French decrees, that broke down the Orders in Council of 1807 and 1809; that dangerous system of monopoly by which we were, as to our commerce, in fact recolonized. Let us then persevere, and under a just Providence we doubt not of final success. The reward is worthy of the cost and privation. It is no less than the lasting peace and independence of ourselves, and our posterity.

There is another view of the subject which your committee are compelled to present to the House. It is due to justice to consider the Message and documents in relation to the conduct of the Executive. They are aware that on ordinary occasions it is not proper for this House to express sentiments of approbation or censure on the conduct of the President, but submit with deference, that as through this body he is responsible to the people for the faithful discharge of his duties, there are cases in which it is not only the right but the duty of this House to express its opinion. Such, in the judgment of your committee, is the present. The language of the resolutions, and the motives avowed by their supporters, leave no alternative. To be silent, would be to condemn. Upon a full investigation of the conduct of the Executive in relation to Great Britain and France, as disclosed in the Message and documents, your committee are of opinion, that a just course has been pursued towards both nations, and in no instance has the dignity, honor or interests of the United States been compromised.

Your committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolution :

"Resolved, That the conduct of the Executive in relation to the various subjects referred to in the resolutions of the 21st day of June, 1813, meets with the approbation of this House."

Mr. CALHOUN moved that the report be referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and made the order of the day for to-morrow (Wednesday.)

Mr. BENSON, of New York, moved to postpone the subject to the second Monday in December next. He said the resolutions were explicit, and ought to have been answered distinctly, and the documents furnished with such an answer; instead of which the Secretary of State had entered into a long argument in justification of the conduct of the Administration and the war. This was unprecedented, and, in his opinion, improper. The House had asked the President for information as to certain facts, and had received a long plea in favor of the Government and the war. Besides, he said, many of the minority had left the city, and a fair expression of the opinion of the House could not be had at this time.

The postponement was opposed by several gentlemen.

Mr. CALHOUN could not consent to it, because he thought the subject was such as, in justice to the President, to require the decision of the House. The course adopted by the President was not unprecedented. In answer to the resolutions read the other day, Mr. Secretary Hamilton had made a long argumentative report. In this case it was peculiarly proper. Mr. C. said, when the resolutions were adopted, he had attempted to procure amendments, which would have prevented the necessity of such a report from the Secretary. He had failed in his attempts. He had foreseen this course and endeavored to prevent it. He could not agree to the postponement.

Mr. BENSON declared he had read no resolutions upon which Mr. Hamilton had made a report to the House. He had read resolutions asking information upon a subject, and the reply was made by the Secretary of State.

Mr. SHEFFEY said he was against the postponement. He thought the preposterous reasoning, and the sophistry of the report, ought to be exposed at this session. It had a tendency to impose upon the people, and ought to be stripped of its sophistry.

Mr. PEARSON was against the postponement. He thought the report, circulated as it was at public expense, was entitled to a full examination. It merited reply. He hoped, therefore, that the motion to postpone would be withdrawn.

Mr. BENSON said he would not differ with his friends, although he continued of the opinion, that a postponement was proper. He withdrew his motion.

Motions were then successively made, that it be made the order of the day for Thursday and for Monday; and another motion, that the whole should lie on the table, was made by Mr. KING, of North Carolina. Upon these motions there was a long desultory discussion. The remarks of such gentlemen as the reporter could hear are substantially subjoined.

Mr. RHEA said the subject ought to be taken up immediately. Gentlemen in opposition had obtained leave of absence. They might depart before the report might be considered. The subject should be acted upon without delay, and the resolution immediately passed.

Mr. SEYBERT was for Monday. He wished to

JULY, 1813.

Foreign Relations.

H. OF R.

get through the taxes, and other important business, and then he and other gentlemen would go home, leaving those who wished to discuss the report to do it at their leisure.

Mr. BURWELL made similar remarks, and added, that, in his opinion, it would be improper and unfair to begin a discussion, now that great numbers in opposition to the report had left the House and the city, under the most explicit understanding, that subjects of this kind were not again to be discussed during the present session. It had been so understood on all sides; and the gentleman who introduced the resolutions (Mr. WEBSTER) had left the city under this general impression. He thought it unfair and improper to bring on the subject in his absence, and under such circumstances. He was therefore for the longest day. Mr. B. said, although he had obtained leave of absence, he should not leave the House while any important business was before it.

Mr. GROSVENOR said, that he had not been able fully to comprehend the answer of the Secretary from only one reading. It consisted of an answer to the resolutions which, from his present impressions, was explicit, and he hoped from full examination would be satisfactory, producing the conviction which the advocates of the resolutions had anticipated. Appended to this answer was a very long argument of the Secretary, upon the subjects which had recently been discussed in the House. That argument, as far as he was able to comprehend it from one reading, contained nothing novel or remarkable for force and ingenuity; it was such as he had before frequently heard and read upon the same side of the subject; neither more conclusive or convincing to his mind than those which had preceded it. Whether it contained misstatements of a glaring nature he could not say until he should read it; if it did not, he knew of nothing which would entitle it to a discussion on this floor; let it go to the people; the subject could not be misunderstood.

He said, however, that if it should be necessary to discuss it, time ought to be given until Monday. It was long; could not be printed until to-morrow. It referred to many documents; a few new documents were furnished. The minority could not examine it, or compare the new documents with those heretofore furnished, and be ready to discuss it, if, indeed, they should deem a discussion necessary before Monday; he was for that day. But under the impression that the chairman of the committee would not call it up until a proper time had expired to examine it, nor press a premature decision, he had no objection that it should lie on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, declared he thought an importance was given to the business which it did not merit; he was for laying it on the table until the important business of the House was through, and not suffer it to create discussions without object and without end.

Mr. BIBB was for laying it on the table; he deprecated a protracted session, which a discussion of this subject would produce.

Mr. CALHOUN assured the House that nothing was farther from his intention, and that of the committee, than to introduce a discussion of the subject into the House. It was necessary and proper for the Secretary to go at length into the subject. It was equally necessary for the House to express their opinion upon the answer. This was the opinion at least of the Committee of Foreign Relations. As to any discussion, that would depend upon the manner in which the report was treated by the minority.

Mr. PITKIN was against consuming the time of the House upon this subject. He made many pertinent remarks tending to show that the course was novel and unprecedented.

Mr. GHOLSON said he regretted the observations of the gentleman from Georgia, (Mr. BIBB;) he considered the subject all important, that it should be promptly decided. As to the minority, they were forward enough to discuss this very subject the other day; but now they seemed to shrink from it.

Mr. GROSVENOR said he rose to repel the insinuation of the gentleman last up. If the gentleman had got it into his head that the minority wished to avoid, or feared a discussion of this, or any other subject, he never indulged a greater mistake; and he had no doubt the progress of this business would go far to undeceive the gentleman. All they demanded was, that as the paper was very long, was but ill understood, and could not be printed until to-morrow, that time should be allowed to read, to understand, and to discuss it fully and effectually.

Mr. GHOLSON asked if that gentleman (Mr. G.) was the organ of the minority. He had alluded to the gentleman from Connecticut and others in the minority.

Mr. GROSVENOR answered, he was his own organ. He had the honor to think, act, and speak, with the minority; and whenever a reflection was insinuated upon the honor of that minority, he should take the liberty publicly to repel it.

Mr. PITKIN declared that he had expressed no wish, nor had he any, to avoid a discussion; he had been totally misunderstood; he had heard no such wish on the part of the minority. Upon that subject he should judge for himself, when he should have an opportunity to read the report. But he protested against hurrying on any vote or discussion, before members had a full opportunity of examining the long report of the Secretary.

Mr. GASTON said he was against the report's lying on the table, and in favor of fixing a certain day. He was against the first course, because any gentleman might call it up at any time, whether gentlemen might be prepared to discuss it or not; he was in favor of an earlier day than Monday. He said, upon these minor points, a disposition to accommodate among members was always commendable. On points of importance let them remain inflexible; none would be more so than himself. But his impression was now that the subject ought to be discussed, and the sophistry of the answer exposed. But, before he could form an opinion, he wished to read and consider the report; if it demanded a discussion then, he should not shrink from it under any circumstances.

Mr. NELSON then rose, and spoke nearly as follows: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that the chairman of the committee has receded one inch. I regret that he has endeavored to accommodate all. We all remember how the discussion was conducted the other day upon the resolutions. The gentlemen in the minority claimed the advantage and boasted of the victory. Sir, let us advance to this subject at once; I would not give the minority a longer day than the earliest mentioned, that is to-morrow. If we are not able to vindicate our measures, and sustain ourselves on this floor, let us abandon our places to the minority—to men who can sustain themselves here. I would not yield an inch; I would not permit delay; I would bring the subject immediately on; I am, therefore, for the earliest day.

Some remarks were made by other members tending to show that such precipitation prevented the possibility of discussion, as gentlemen well knew the report could not be laid on the table under two or three days.

The motion for Monday was negatived.

Mr. CALHOUN assented to Thursday, and it was made the order for that day; and five thousand copies ordered to be printed.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The House proceeded to consider the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill to lay a duty on salt imported into the United States: when the question was stated to concur with the Committee of the whole House in their first amendment, to wit: to strike out the words "passing of this act," and to insert the "first day of January next."

And a motion was made by Mr. WRIGHT, that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; and the question was then taken thereon, and determined in the negative—yeas 56, nays 88, as follows:

The residue of the said amendments were then further amended: when a motion was made by Mr. HALL, further to amend the said amendments, by striking out all of the same, except the clause which limits the continuance of the act until the end of the war and for one year thereafter.

And the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 55, nays 79, as follows:

On motion of Mr. MACON, the bill was ordered to lie on the table.

WEDNESDAY, July 14.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, reported the bill from the Senate, "making an appropriation for the further defence of the ports and harbors of the United States," without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. TROUP, from the same committee, reported a bill authorizing the sale of sundry lots, the property of the United States, in the borough of Pittsburg; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

Mr. TROUP, from the same committee, also reported a bill to regulate the allowance of forage to officers in the Army of the United States; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have concurred in the amendments of the House to the bill "for the relief of Alexander Scott," with amendments; in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise.

After the adoption of several unimportant amendments, Mr. BIBB moved so to amend the bill as to include in the tax wholesale, as well as retail, dealers.—Agreed to.

The Committee of the Whole then took up the bill laying a duty on bank notes, notes of hand, and foreign bills of exchange of certain descriptions.

Mr. BIBB explained the grounds on which he supported this measure at the present time.

Mr. TAYLOR, after some explanatory remarks, going to show the difficulty of collecting a revenue on stamped paper, and the great inconveniences of such a tax on the people, made a motion to strike out a part of the first section of the bill for laying a tax on promissory notes, &c., so as to impose a duty on bank notes alone.

Considerable discussion arose on this motion, in which Messrs. TAYLOR, WRIGHT, and JACKSON, supported the amendment; and Messrs. BIBB, ROBERTS, CLAY, and SEYBERT, opposed it. The question was taken, and decided in the negative—ayes 34. noes 64.

The Speaker (Mr. CLAY) then moved to amend the bill, so as to confine the tax on notes, &c., to those negotiated at banks, with a view to except from stamp duties the ordinary country transactions by notes, &c.; which motion Mr. C. supported by a luminous and comprehensive view of the expediency and policy of the course he proposed.

After some remarks from Mr. JACKSON, approving the proposition of Mr. CLAY, but suggesting a variation of the proposed mode of collecting the tax, and in opposition to the amendment from Mr. WRIGHT, the question was taken on Mr. CLAY's motion, and carried without a division.

The bill having been gone through, and some further amendments made thereto, the Committee rose, reported the bill to the House as amended, and obtained leave to sit again on the remaining tax bills.

The House proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of the Whole; and, having gone through the first bill and agreed to the amendments reported by the Committee, a motion was made to adjourn, and carried.

THURSDAY July 15.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "to establish the town of Mobile a port of entry," with amendments, in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The amendments were read, and concurred in.

Mr. BIBB, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported the agreement of that committee to the amendments of the Senate to the bill "for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties," with an amendment; which, together with the amendments of the Senate, were read, and concurred in by the House.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the committee to whom was recommended the bill from the Senate "supplementary to the acts heretofore passed on the subject of a uniform rule of naturalization," reported the same with amendments; which were read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole on Saturday next.

The following order was moved by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH:

"Ordered, That five thousand copies be printed of the resolution passed by this House on the first day of March last, requesting certain information from the President of the United States; relative to the French decree purporting to be a repeal of the Berlin and Milan decrees, and of the communication made to this House by the President, on the third of the same month, in consequence of that resolution, and also of the resolutions of the House of the 21st of June last, requesting further information on the same subject."

And on the question that the House do now proceed to consider the said order, it was determined in the negative—yeas 52, nays 77.

The amendment of the Senate to the amendment of this House to the bill "for the relief of Alexander Scott" was read, and referred to the Committee of the whole House to-day.

An engrossed bill to regulate the allowance of forage to officers in the Army of the United States, was read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "authorizing the payment for wagons and teams captured or destroyed by the enemy at Detroit," in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The said bill was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Ordered, That the bill laying duties on bank notes, and on notes of hand, and foreign bills of exchange, of certain descriptions, do lie on the table.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate "making an appropriation for the further defence of the ports and harbors of the United States;" and, after some time spent therein, the bill was reported without amendment, read the third time, and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have disagreed to the amendment of this House to their amendment to the bill "for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties."

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise.

A motion was made by Mr. BIBB to reconsider the vote of yesterday, concurring in the amendment to insert the words "except in case of pedlars," in the twenty-fifth line of the first section. And the question being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

The question was then again taken to concur in the said amendment, and was determined in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. TAYLOR to reconsider the vote of yesterday, concurring in an amendment to come in at the end of the first section. And the question being taken it was determined in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. PITKIN further to amend the said bill, by striking out from the first section the following words:

"That every person who shall deal in the selling of any goods, wares, or merchandise, except such as are of the growth, produce, or manufacture, of the United States, and except such as are sold in the original cask, case, box, or package, wherein the same shall have been imported, shall be deemed to be, and hereby is declared to be, a retail dealer in merchandise within the meaning of this act."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 37, nays 90, as follows:

A motion was then made by Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, to amend the bill by adding the following proviso to the end of the first section:

"And provided further, That nothing in this act contained shall prevent the owner, master, mate, and mariners, of any vessel of the United States, of not more than one hundred and fifty tons burden, from selling their respective proportions of the return cargo of such vessel, in the original cask, case, box, or package, wherein the same shall have been imported, in the same manner as though this act had never been passed."

And the question being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

The said bill was then further amended at the Clerk's table, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-morrow.

The House resumed the consideration of the amendments reported by the Committee of the Whole to the bill laying duties on bank notes, and on notes of hand, and foreign bills of exchange, of certain descriptions; and the said amendments being again read at the Clerk's table, were severally concurred in by the House.

A motion was then made by Mr. KING, of Massachusetts, further to amend the bill, by adding the following proviso to the end of the first section, to wit:

"Provided further, That where any bank, by the existing laws of any State, now pays a tax on the capital stock or dividend of such bank to such State, such tax shall be deducted from the amount of the tax imposed by this act."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

Mr. KING again moved further to amend the bill, by adding the following proviso to the end of the second section, to wit:

"Provided, That where any bank, by the existing laws of any State, now pays a tax to such State on the capital stock or dividend of such bank, such tax shall be deducted from the composition allowed by this act; provided it does not exceed one per cent. on the amount of the annual dividend of such bank."

On motion of Mr. STUART, the House was cleared of all persons except the Members, Clerk, Sergeant-at-Arms, and Doorkeeper, and the doors were closed; and after remaining so for some time, they were opened, and the House adjourned.

FRIDAY, July 16.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a "bill for the remission of certain duties to the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts;" also, a bill "concerning suits and costs in the courts of the United States;" also, a bill "for the relief of Elisha J. Winter;" and a "resolution respecting a day of public humiliation and prayer;" in which bills and resolution they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have passed the bill "to establish the office of Commissioner of the Revenue;" with an amendment, in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

An engrossed bill "to authorize the transportation of certain documents free of postage" was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill "to prohibit the use of licenses or passes, granted by the authority of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Leave was given to introduce a bill to authorize the transportation of certain documents free of postage; which was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, disagreeing to the amendment of this House to the amendment of the Senate to the bill "for the assessment and collection of direct taxes and internal duties;" whereupon, the House recessed from their said amendment.

Ordered, That Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. RICHARDSON, and Mr. YANCEY, be appointed of the Committee of Foreign Relations, in the place of Mr. JACKSON, of Virginia, Mr. FISK, of New York, and Mr. WEBSTER, who are absent on leave.

PROPERTY LOST AT DETROIT.

Mr. ARCHER, from the Committee of Claims, reported the bill from the Senate "authorizing the payment for wagons and teams, captured or destroyed by the enemy at Detroit," with amendments; which were read, and, with the bill, committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow. The report is as follows:

"That it appears from the documents submitted to them, that the property taken at Detroit by the enemy consisted principally of wagons and teams hired by the deputy quartermaster to the army, under the command of General Hull, for the purpose of transporting the army and the necessary baggage of that army to the place of its destination. By the estimation of the quartermaster, the private property taken and detained amounted in value to the sum of twenty-three thousand dollars and nine cents. It is, however, evident that this estimation is merely conjectural, because upwards of thirty wagons and teams which had been hired, and which were captured or destroyed, were never appraised: the owners of this property voluntarily entered into the public service, for an equivalent in money. Orders for the impressment of wagons and teams had been made out, but were never issued or executed in consequence of the owners of this property voluntarily entering it for hire into the public service. It is stated by the quartermaster, that intimations were given by him, as well as by other agents of the Government, to the proprietors of this property, that in the event of its being captured by the enemy, or destroyed in the service, they would be reimbursed; but no positive engagements to that effect were entered into.

"It further appears to your committee, that Colonel James Findley, of the Ohio volunteers, and James Taylor, acting quartermaster general to the Northwestern army, did protest against the detention of all the property, for the loss of which this bill offers a remuneration, inasmuch as it was private property, and under the articles of capitulation, signed at Detroit, on the 16th of August, 1812, was to be respected.

"The foregoing statement of facts, as they are found to exist in this case, presents two questions for the consideration of the House.

"1st. How far the circumstance of the owners of the property having entered it voluntarily, for hire, into the public service, exonerates the Government from the claim of the different individuals to remuneration?

"2d. Whether it would be expedient for the United States to remunerate those whose property was destroyed, contrary to the articles of capitulation signed at Detroit?

"With regard to the first question, your committee have only to observe, that they cannot distinguish the case of the present claimants from that of an individual who should hire any species of property to another for service, in a hazardous enterprise, and which should be lost or destroyed, without the fault or negligence of the individual to whom the property was hired. Both parties are aware of the danger to which the property will be exposed, and your committee would presume that in such a case responsibility could neither legally nor equitably exist. In the case before us, every individual must be supposed to know the danger to which his property would be exposed. The nature of the enterprise precludes the possibility of a contrary supposition. Indeed, the anxiety which the owners of this property evinced to know what would be the ultimate determination of the Government in the event of the loss, sanctions the existence of much apprehended danger on their part. Nor does it appear that the expression of an opinion favorable to the wishes of the claimants, by several of the agents of the Government, should have any operation in the establishment of the justice of their claims; because these agents, evidently upon such a subject, could give no assurance which could, in justice, be binding on the Government. If these individuals had entered their property into the public service by any compulsory process on the part of the officers of the United States, the committee would not hesitate to say that they ought to be remunerated to the extent of all consequential losses. But, as they voluntarily hired their property, it cannot be discovered that their case differs in any one particular from the numerous class of contracts which daily take place in society.

"In regard to the second consideration, it does not appear that the claimants are more entitled to the favorable interposition of Congress. This property, inasmuch as it belonged to private citizens, was, by the articles of capitulation, to be respected. It would doubtless be the duty of the United States to claim of the Government of Great Britain remuneration to the full amount of property destroyed by its agents contrary to the articles of capitulation solemnly entered into. Such stipulations should ever be inviolably adhered to by the contracting parties. And the nation, whose citizens are injured by such a violation, has a fair claim against the party violating them. On this view of the subject, it appears that the bill is premature, inasmuch as, from the present relations existing between the two nations, indemnification could not have been obtained by the United States. Great Britain has, in the present instance, violated an express obligation. By the wanton destruction and plunder of private property, in our villages on the seacoast, she has violated an implied obligation. The obligation in the latter case is as strong as in the former; for she is certainly implicitly bound to adhere to the mode of warfare practised by all civilized nations, as much as she could possibly be to preserve inviolate the provisions of any express stipulation. If this position be correct, and the present bill should pass, every individual in the nation who had sustained injury by the wanton plunder and destruction of private property by the enemy, would have an equally fair claim to an ample remuneration for all losses which they have sustained. Such an indemnification, granted to the full extent, would exhaust the resources of the nation, in a war protracted to any considerable length of time, against a nation who possesses so many powerful means of annoyance. The magnitude of the sum thus to be granted would, in itself, in a political point of view, manifest the impolicy of the grant. Indeed, it does not appear to your committee but that upon the same principle the United States would be bound to indemnify all her numerous citizens whose property had been captured under the unlawful edicts of the European Governments; because all Governments are under a moral obligation to respect the law of nations. Yet, it is presumed, that no one will attempt to show the responsibility of the United States in such cases, until, on the part of their citizens, they had obtained indemnification from the Governments thus violating their rights.

"The committee, therefore, according to the best views which they are enabled to take of the subject, cannot forbear expressing the opinion, that the bill above alluded to ought not to pass."

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The House resumed the consideration of the bill to lay a duty on imported salt. The question recurred on concurring in the second amendment reported by the Committee of the Whole House.

A motion was made by Mr. MACON, to amend the said amendment, by inserting the following section, to come in as the third section of the bill:

SEC. 3. And be it further enacted, That no bounty, drawback, or allowance, shall be made, under the authority of this act, unless it shall be proved, to the satisfaction of the Collector, that the pickled fish or salted provisions for which the bounty, drawback, or allowance, shall be claimed, was wholly cured with foreign salt, and on which a duty shall have been secured or paid.

MR. JOHN REED.—Mr. Speaker, it was not my intention to have troubled this House with any observations at this time. But, sir, I consider it my duty to offer some plain and obvious reasons in favor of the proposed amendment; and also to read some extracts from an able and elaborate report of a former Secretary of State on the subject.

The amendment now under consideration, to the bill laying a duty of twenty cents per bushel on imported salt, makes an allowance to vessels engaged in the cod fisheries under certain limitations and restrictions as therein provided, and also allows a drawback on the exportation of pickled fish and salted provisions. The allowance and drawback abovementioned are intended as an equivalent to the duty paid on the salt used in the curing and preserving fish and meat.

I would state to this House that, in the curing and preserving codfish, great quantities of salt, especially in comparison with the value of fish cured and preserved, are absolutely requisite. I believe the remark equally true as it respects pickled fish.

If a duty of twenty cents per bushel be laid on all foreign salt, as contemplated by the bill on your table, and the proposed amendment should not prevail, this tax would be oppressive on fishermen beyond all precedent or endurance.

Shall I be permitted to state some cases for the consideration of this House? Suppose a fishing vessel of seventy tons burden use 1,500 bushels of salt in the fishing season; a duty of twenty cents per bushel would amount to three hundred dollars. If all the profits to all the fishermen and owners of such vessel as I have described during the fishing seasons and markets would amount to nine hundred dollars, then, by the proposed tax of three hundred, you take from their pockets 33 $\frac{1}{3}$ per cent., or one-third part of all the income and profits of fishermen.

The gentleman from North Carolina (Mr. PICKENS) has several times addressed this House on the proposed amendment. That gentleman observed yesterday that the salt tax would bear very hard on his constituents. He stated that in the district he had the honor to represent salt sold for about two dollars per bushel, that the addition of twenty cents would be a severe burden; at the same time, that gentleman seems much opposed to any amendment which has for its object the relief of any portion of the community from the proposed duty. Other gentlemen have advanced the same sentiments. If a farmer use fifteen or thirty bushels of salt he must pay a tax to this Government of three dollars or six dollars. If a fisherman, possessed of the same value of property, and having the same income, should use 1,500 or 3,000 bushels of salt, of course he would pay a tax to this Government of three hundred or six hundred dollars. The hypothetical statements I have made, I believe substantially true. I will not for a moment believe any gentleman in this House, while he complains of burdens about to be laid on his own constituents, almost too heavy to be borne, will consent to lay burdens one hundred fold heavier on any portion of the inhabitants of any section of the United States.

Again, by the Constitution we have no power to tax the exports of our own country; and by a provision in the bill on your table, conformable to the uniform policy of the country, when salt imported is again exported, a drawback is allowed. If no duty can be laid on our own exports, and a drawback of duties paid be allowed on the exportation of foreign merchandise, I am unable to perceive any good reason, founded either in justice or the fitness of things, why those who pay the duties on salt necessarily used in preserving fish and meats should not be entitled to the like advantages on the exportation of the same, as they would have been, if the salt had not been usefully employed. It can certainly be no objection in the mind of any man that the salt is incorporated with the fish—a production of this country of so little profit to the fisherman and so highly advantageous to the United States. The quantity of salt necessarily used can be easily ascertained. I do not believe the allowance proposed adequate to the duty on salt which must necessarily be used. It certainly ought to be our object to tax every portion of the inhabitants of the United States as equally as possible. It is my solemn and deliberate opinion that those engaged in the fisheries now pay this Government more, in proportion to the value of their property, than any other class of citizens in the United States. They pay various taxes not known to those not engaged in navigation. Tonnage duty alone, and the trouble and vexation of paying it, is a much heavier tax than the land and house tax, so much feared and dreaded. I can by no means agree with the honorable gentleman from Virginia, who stated a few days since that ship owners did not at all regard the tonnage duty, as they charged it to the consumers. To fishermen, at least, it is a tax. It takes the money directly from them, and places it in your treasury. They can recover nothing of the tax paid from the consumers, as European nations are the consumers, and we are wholly unable to regulate or control their markets. The above remark is equally true and applicable to the duty paid on salt.

The amendment proposed is most important as it affects the interests of the nation. You can obtain little from fishermen. The business is too poor; it will not afford it. They are now distressed more than any other class of citizens. I assure you they cannot pay into your Treasury one third of all the profits of their voyages. If, therefore, you prosecute the notions of some, you may destroy the fisheries, but will gain very little revenue.

Shall I call the attention of this House to England and France as examples for us? Much as those nations need revenue, they have not resorted to taxation of their fisheries. They have uniformly encouraged their fisheries. They have laid duties on the importation of foreign fish, or prohibited them altogether, and given bounties to their own fishermen. Shall we tax our fisheries, and to so great an amount? I trust not.

The fisheries have been justly considered the nurseries of seamen; the best seamen in the world. Without fisheries we can have but few good seamen, unless we continue to employ foreigners, which will always involve us in war. Without seamen we can have no commerce. I certainly shall not attempt to prove to this House the intimate and necessary connexion between commerce and agriculture and manufactures, and every other species of interest in the country.

"The loss of seamen unnoticed would be followed by other losses in a long train. If we have no seamen our ships will be useless, consequently our ship timber, iron, and hemp, our ship-building, will be all at an end; ship-carpenters go over to other nations; our young men have no call to the sea; our produce, carried in foreign bottoms, be saddled with war freight and insurance, in time of war."

"France, sensible of the necessity of balancing the power of England on the water, and, therefore, of improving every resource for raising seamen, and seeing that her fishermen could not maintain their competition without some public patronage, adopted the experiment of bounties on her own fish, and duties on that of foreign nations brought into her markets.

"The plan of the English Government since the peace, has been to prohibit all foreign fish in their markets, and they have given from eighteen to fifty pounds sterling, on every fishing vessel complying with certain conditions. This policy is said to have been so far successful as to have raised the number of seamen employed in that business, since 1786, to fourteen thousand, and the quantity of fish taken to seven hundred and thirty-two thousand quintals.

"A view of the cod fishery enables us to mark the fact that it is too poor a business to be left to itself, even with the nation most advantageously situated.

"The cod and whale fisheries carried on by different persons, from different ports, in different vessels, in different seas, and seeking different markets, agree in one circumstance, in being as unprofitable to the adventurer as important to the public."

"On the whole, the historical view we have taken of the fisheries, proves they are so poor in themselves as to come to nothing with distant nations who do not support them with their treasury. We have seen that the advantages of our position place our fisheries on a ground somewhat higher, such as to relieve our treasury from the necessity of giving them support, but not to permit it to draw a support from them, nor to dispense the Government from the obligation for effectuating free markets for them."

In every view in which I have been able to examine the subject, it does appear to me that the proposed amendment ought to be adopted. I do believe it comports with the true policy of the United States as well as the interest of those whom it is intended more immediately to affect.

If we look back to the commencement of the law laying a duty on salt in the year 1790, we shall find a drawback of ten cents per quintal was also allowed on the exportation of dried fish. A drawback was also allowed on the barrel on the exportation of provisions and pickled fish.

The law allowing a drawback on the exportation of dried fish, was repealed in the year 1792, but an allowance was made to vessels engaged in the cod fishery similar to the allowance proposed by the amendment on your table. This allowance was understood and expressed to be in lieu of a drawback of the duty paid on salt, and as a commutation and equivalent therefor.

In the year 1792 the duty on salt was increased. The allowances and drawbacks were proportionably increased. And in the year 1797, when the duty was again increased to twenty cents, as now proposed, the allowance and drawback were again proportionably increased, and so continued until the year 1807, when the salt tax was repealed.

I consider it improper to call the allowance proposed by the amendment a bounty, as some gentlemen are disposed to call it. It is no bounty. It will not amount to the duty paid by the fishermen on salt.

Nor will the proposed allowance benefit the merchant as has been suggested by some gentlemen in this House. In a fishing voyage all are partners, from the owner of the vessel and master to the cook. Each person on board must pay a proportion of the duty on the salt used, and will receive of any allowance which may be made in proportion to the fish he may take. This may be known from the fishing law passed this session. I confidently trust we shall not, while at war professedly for sailor's rights; while we are contending with the enemy with our right hand, destroy those sailors with our left hand.

The question being taken on Mr. MACON's amendment, it passed in the affirmative.

A motion was made by Mr. FISK of Vermont, further to amend the bill, by striking out the following words, from the eighth to the eleventh lines, inclusively: "and on all provisions salted within the United States, (dried fish excepted,) and exported therefrom, subsequent to the said day, there shall be allowed and paid a bounty of twenty cents per barrel."

And the question thereon being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

A motion was made by Mr. MACON, that the further consideration of the bill be postponed until the first Monday in November next; the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 51, nays 85, as follows:

SATURDAY, July 17.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, the petition of the officers and crew of the United States' late brig Vixen were referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. Roberts,

Resolved, That the Naval Committee be further instructed to inquire if any, and, if any, what, alterations it would be expedient to make relative to fees charged in the Courts of Admiralty in the trial of libels on prize goods; and that they have power to report by bill or otherwise.

The bill from the Senate, "for the remission of certain duties to the Pennsylvania Academy of the Fine Arts," was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

A bill from the Senate, "concerning suits and costs in courts of the United States," was read twice and referred to Mr. PITKIN, Mr. CHEVES, Mr. OAKLEY, Mr. INGERSOLL, and Mr. PICKENS.

The bill from the Senate, "for the relief of Elisha J. Winter," was read twice and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The resolution from the Senate, "respecting a day of public humiliation and prayer," was read twice and ordered to be read the third time to-day.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the bill "to establish the office of Commissioner of the Revenue," was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-day.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "laying duties on sales at auction of merchandise, and of ships and vessels;" also, the bill "laying duties on licenses to distillers of spirituous liquors;" also, the bill "laying duties on sugars refined within the United States;" also, the bill "laying duties on carriages for the conveyance of persons," with amendments to each; in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO PRIVATEERS.

Mr. NELSON submitted the following resolutions for consideration:

1. Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of affording encouragement to the private armed vessels of the United States to cruise against the ships and vessels of the enemy, by diminishing the duties on prizes and prize goods captured by them; and that they have leave to report by bill, or otherwise.

2. Resolved, That the Naval Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of encouraging the private armed ships of the United States to capture the officers, seamen, and marines, of the enemy, by holding out the offer of a bounty for all such captives.

A motion was made by Mr. BIBB to amend the first resolution, by striking out the words "by diminishing the duties on prizes and prize goods, captured by them, or by permitting them to bring into port, free from duty, all prizes and prize goods." And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. INGHAM to amend the first resolution, by striking out the words "or by permitting them to bring into port, free from duty, all prizes and prize goods." And the question thereon being taken, it passed in the affirmative.

A division of the question to agree to the said resolutions was called for: Upon which, the

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

An engrossed bill laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish, and allowances to certain vessels employed in the fisheries, was read the third time; and the question was stated, Shall this bill pass? When a motion was made by Mr. MURFREE that the bill be postponed until the first Monday in December next. And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 62, nays 87, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baylies of Massachusetts, Benson, Bigelow, Bowers, Bradbury, Breckenridge, Brigham, Burwell, Butler, Caperton, Champion, Cilley, Culpeper, Davenport, Ely, Forsyth, Franklin, Gaston, Gloninger, Goldsborough, Grosvenor, Hanson, Hungerford, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, Kent of Maryland, Kerr, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Miller, Moore, Moseley, Murfree, Oakley, Pearson, Pickering, Pickens, Pitkin, Potter, Richardson, Ridgely, Ruggles, Sheffield, Sherwood, Shipherd, Smith of New York, Smith of Virginia, Stanford, Strong, Stuart, Sturges, Taggart, Thompson, Vose, Wheaton, White, Wilcox, Wilson of Massachusetts, Winter, Wright, and Yancey.

The question was then put that the said bill do pass.

Mr. HANSON rose.—He said, as from appearances, the bill was about to pass sub silentio, he would offer no apology for claiming the attention of the House for a few minutes upon a question so important. But, in submitting a few plain and obvious suggestions, he by no means intended to go into a general investigation and discussion of the merits of the system of revenue devised by the Committee of Finance; he would not follow the puerile example of aiming at a display of deep research, nor consume hours in exhibiting the demerits of the still more important system it was the province of the committee to provide for. Reserving himself for an approaching and more proper occasion, he should avoid the introduction of topics involving a discussion of our foreign relations.

Mr. H. said his present purpose was, briefly, to expose, and, if to be effected by any efforts from a quarter so obnoxious to defeat, what he deemed an undignified attempt on the part of this Government to practise a gross deception upon the public creditors, and to decoy the moneyed interests of the country. He said, until the wonderful year 1813, when it would seem, in this hemisphere, at least, advances had been made with such inconceivable celerity towards a state of infinite human perfectibility—he would venture to say, that a like anomaly in finance, a similar departure from the principles of political economy was never before heard of, as a system of revenue, to go into operation in futuro, and limited to a short period after the war, under the existing peculiar circumstances of the country. What were those circumstances? War had been engaged in with a powerful enemy, possessing all the means, and, if the speculations of its authors were correct, driven on by considerations of interest and national policy to inflict upon this country every injury which those means placed within her power. The preparations made, and means devised to conduct the war to an honorable and successful issue, had been hitherto wholly inadequate. Cut off from the accustomed source of pecuniary supply by the selection of the enemy made by the Administration; our commercial revenue being dried up by the war with Great Britain, the only remaining reliances for the ways and means were loans and internal taxation. The former reliance depended upon the latter; money could not be borrowed without creating, in good faith, a solid, sufficient public fund, equal to the payment of the interest, and looking to the gradual extinction of the amount to be borrowed; the expenses to be incurred, and the public debt to be created. The inquiry then was, whether the system submitted by the Committee of Finance was calculated to maintain the public faith and credit. It was worthy of serious consideration, that the very revenue arising from our commerce, which was now reduced to a mere name, had been already thrice pledged, and that these very pledges had been rendered valueless by making the Treasury bills (for the redemption of which the same fund was again pledged) receivable for the customs. The eight million commercial fund, staked for the extinguishment of the old public debt, had also been pledged for the reimbursement of the eleven million loan, the sixteen million loan, and, lastly, for the redemption of the Treasury bills. These Treasury bills had no intrinsic value; the currency they gained was owing to an artificial value imparted to them by the fund pledged for their redemption, which fund no longer existed, being destroyed together with our commerce. Of course the fund created and pledged for the old debt, the loan of eleven millions, the loan of sixteen millions, and for the redemption of the Treasury bills, consisted only of those bills. Thus was the public faith violated, and so might the credit of the Government be reduced, if not as low as it was during the war of the Revolution, at least to a point of the most alarming depression.

It was to be recollected, also, that the two loans already negotiated were in anticipation of this system of taxes, which was expected to give to Government the credit necessary to enable and entitle it to go into the market upon advantageous terms. Future and necessary loans were to be negotiated upon the faith of the system under discussion. This system, instead of giving the Government credit, was calculated to destroy its credit. Postponing the period for the system to go into operation to a distant day, Mr. H. considered equivalent to a rejection of the system. It would not fail to be regarded, that the period fixed for the tax laws to go into operation, was so remote as to admit of their repeal at the Winter session, at which time they could just as well be enacted. Nor would the public creditors close their eyes to the important fact of their limitation to a period when the system would be most wanted, and when the public debt, produced by the war, would have accumulated to its highest amount. Then it was that the fund securing the public creditors, and supporting the credit of the Government, was to be taken away when most required. These public creditors, and the moneyed men of the country generally, unless as blind as moles, as stubborn and stupid as mules, would consider the faith of Administration violated, and the public credit gone. An individual might as well attempt to borrow a sum of money for twenty years by offering security for two years, and leaving the lender to take his chance for the residue of the time, as for Government to expect to raise money to carry on this war upon the faith of a system of revenue to expire a year after the war, and perhaps never to go into operation.

What is the course of reasoning, which, even men of ordinary minds—of the most obtuse, dull apprehension—and we all know, said Mr. H., that speculators in the funds are not of that class of men who are deficient in acuteness) would naturally and at once adopt? They would see through the tenuous veil which covered the deception as quickly as the rays of the rising sun pierce and dispel the morning mist. They would come at once to the conclusion, that the Government security, which they considered as solemnly pledged when they contracted for the loan, was now as solemnly withheld. Having invested a considerable amount of money in the stocks, and being deeply interested in keeping up the price, they might manœuvre to answer that object; but, as certainly as the effect followed the cause, they would go secretly into the market and sell out. This operation could not be concealed—although a few shrewd, active men, might escape from the wreck—and, being discovered, a rapid depreciation would follow, and the funds would ultimately be reduced to the grade of the old Continental currency. To Mr. H.'s mind it was clear that the passage of the bills, in their present form, would be destructive of the public credit. The public creditors would quickly discover their disappointment and alarm.

In all other matters, by a sort of political ambidextrousness, said Mr. H., you may hoodwink, deceive, and control the people; you may guide the popular sentiment and feeling; but in affairs of money they will think and act for themselves. Here, said he, party prejudice and passion fail you; for we have had abundant proof, since this disastrous war commenced, that there is, with a certain description of thorough-going patriots, no perceptible connexion between their patriotism and their pockets. Indeed, in those sections of our country most clamorous for war, there was very little, if any anything, worth naming, contributed to carry it on. The very States that were responsible for the measure; that were open-mouthed for the declaration of war; who pledged "their lives and fortunes and their sacred honor" in its support, over and over again, until it became as a tale thrice told;—these same life-and-fortune States deserted the Government in the hour of its utmost need. Empty professions and vain boastings constituted the sum and stock of their amor patriæ, because you no longer relied upon appeals to their angry passions and political prejudices, but resorted to drafts upon their pockets. This was all very natural, and in precise conformity with the history and nature of all Governments where the people are the supreme power. It partook of the selfishness and sordid qualities which belong to the composition of man. How then, Mr. H. asked, would this sordid, selfish animal, man, in the character of a public creditor, a loan contractor, or a speculator in the funds, reason upon this subject? Determined to take care of himself, and to watch and guard his interest, at least as tenderly as the Administration seemed resolved to nurse its popularity, even though at the cost of the faith and credit of the Government, the loan contractor, with an eagle's eye, would scrutinize the measures of Government—would open or close his hand as it secured or shrunk from the responsibility of enacting the odious laws necessary to secure the public debt.

Mr. H. said, he took it that these creditors and the moneyed men would reason pretty much in this way: A distant day was fixed for this obnoxious system to take effect, that the Administration might be enabled to take the chance of events; and if, after feeling the public pulse by the mere passage of the tax bills in their present inoperative form, it should be found the people would not bear this depletive system of taxation, why then the tax laws might or might not be repealed before they took effect, according to the happening of events. What were the events which should resolve them upon the course of turning the deluded creditors adrift to make the best of a bad bargain, and to find their way as well as they could out of their difficulties? They were simply and solely these: the restoration of France to her lost power on the continent of Europe, or the complete and final overthrow of the tyrant. The consequent failure or refusal to negotiate a treaty of peace with England, or the negotiation of such a treaty, in good faith, from hard necessity, by our Government. Mr. H. had not a doubt, if Bonaparte recovered from the blow he had received in Russia, and regained his foothold in the subjugated States that were struggling to throw off the yoke, that then there would be no treaty, and vice versa. But, he said, be these events, which were in the womb of time, as they might, the character of Administration, the faith and credit of Government, were gone, if an efficient, permanent, solid system of revenue, was not established, meeting the expectation of the public creditors, and redeeming the pledge given by Government, at the time a system of internal revenue was first recommended and reported to Congress.

Mr. H. added, he had no question that the scheme of revenue as digested, methodized, altered, and submitted to the House, with the two reservations of postponement and limitation, was the result of a compromise; that a majority could not be carried along to support it, but for the modification embracing these reservations; and that a majority could not have been induced to vote for the taxes, but upon the express condition and expectation that they would never take effect; or, if it was inexpedient to strangle the system at the next session of Congress, that it should cease with the war.

[The Chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means rose and said, he hoped the gentleman from Maryland would name the members of the majority alluded to.]

Mr. H. said he adverted to circumstances within the knowledge of every gentleman in the House.

The circumstances that had passed in review before the House, the appearances exhibited*, and the early opposition made by some of the majority to the taxes, who with difficulty were reconciled to them, left no doubt upon his mind that their support must be the result of a compromise upon the basis of a modification, such as he had mentioned.

* Alluding to the caucus which was held at the Capitol, which was understood to have resulted in nothing at that time, as there was much dissension and wrangling, and the caucus was dissolved in great confusion.—Note by Mr. Hanson.

A few words, said Mr. H., upon the subject of the popularity of the war: They who at the last session vociferated the popularity of the war, and boasted in Stentorian tones of the general determination of the people to prosecute it with vigor, and avenge the blood already spilt upon our frontier, well knew the sentiment of the people ran in an opposite current. When he spoke of the people, he meant the sound, substantial, native population of the country, and not the dregs and feculence of foreign States, vomited upon our shores by the convulsions in the old countries. If he was mistaken in his computation, how happened it that the last Congress, which declared the war, and whose especial, bounden duty it was to supply the means of carrying it on, studiously shunned an appeal to that unerring test—that touchstone of sincerity and patriotism—the pocket? If the war was so popular; if the people preferred war to peace; if the necessary measures growing out of a state of war would have been popular, or at least they would have been submitted to; and a resort to them being unavoidable, would not have endangered a loss of power. But, no; the pulse of the people had been felt; the public feeling and spirit had been tested in another and indirect way; the loan books were opened with a strong appeal to the liberality, the munificence, and patriotism of the country. It turned out that the combatant States abandoned the Government, and would furnish none of the sinews of war. Scarcely one man in a hundred thousand assisted to fill up the loan. It was fair and natural to conclude, that those who would not volunteer their aid to the Government, would ill brook compulsion; that those who had nothing to lend, would not bear exaction; that those who had nothing to put out on interest in the funds, would have still less to satisfy the tax-gatherer. The go-by was therefore given to the taxes, for the want of time to pass the bills; and hence this extra session of Congress, called at an inconvenient, oppressive season, to do what the last Congress shrunk from performing in the hour of trial. Let, then, this Congress supply the omissions of their predecessors; but, in undertaking to do so, let them be astute to avoid falling into greater errors, by attempting to practice upon the presumed ignorance and stupidity of a class of citizens as well qualified to avoid a gull-trap as the wily author of the system.

From principle and the best convictions of the understanding, Mr. H. said, he was opposed to the whole system, as well on account of its defects and deformities, as on the ground of their being supply bills to carry on the war; but, he would not then go into a discussion of the general policy of the war, the mode of conducting it, and the fearful consequences to which it might lead.

The bill was then passed—yeas 90, nays 55, as follows:

The House resumed the consideration of the engrossed bill laying duties on notes of banks, bankers, and certain companies, on notes, bonds, and obligations, discounted by certain companies and on bills of exchange of certain descriptions: Whereupon, the bill was re-committed to a Committee of the Whole House.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose and reported the bill with amendments; which were read as follows:

Strike out from the word "exceeding," in the thirty-fifth line of the engrossed bill, the following words: "ten thousand dollars, five dollars. If above ten thousand, and not exceeding fifty thousand dollars, twenty-five dollars. If above fifty thousand, and not exceeding one hundred thousand dollars, fifty dollars. If above one hundred thousand dollars, one hundred dollars;" and, in lieu thereof, to insert "seven thousand dollars, three dollars and fifty cents. If above seven thousand, and not exceeding eight thousand dollars, four dollars. If above eight thousand dollars, five dollars."

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

NATURALIZATION.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate "supplementary to the acts heretofore passed upon the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization;" and, after some time spent therein, the Committee reported their agreement to the amendment reported thereto by the select committee, with an amendment; which was concurred in by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. ROBERTS to amend the said amendment: by striking out these words: "who had before that day made a declaration, 'according to law, of their intentions to become 'citizens of the United States, or who, by the existing laws of the United States, were, on that day, entitled to become citizens without making 'such declaration;" as, also, to strike out the word "thereof," and, in lieu of the same, to insert, "of 'the United States, if they shall have resided 'therein for the continued term of five years immediately preceding their admission as citizens 'in manner aforesaid:" When a motion was made by Mr. GASTON, that the said bill be postponed indefinitely. And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

The question was then taken on the amendments proposed by Mr. ROBERTS, and was determined in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. KENNEDY further to amend the said amendment, by inserting, after the words "United States," the words, "or had intermarried with a citizen of the United States."

Mr. KENNEDY.—Mr. Chairman, the bill as sent to us from the Senate authorized the naturalization of all alien enemies who had declared their intention to become citizens prior to the declaration of war; and the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROBERTS) not only contemplates the naturalization of every description of alien enemies, by their complying with the requisites of the act of Congress passed on that subject in the year 1802, but also intends to naturalize all those alien enemies that were residing within the limits and under the jurisdiction of the United States, at any time between the 18th day of June, 1798, and the 14th day of April, 1802, immediately and without a compliance with the first provision of the first section of that act, which required a declaration of their intention to become citizens three years before they were admitted.

Sir, I am in favor of the proposed amendment, and will endeavor to give the Committee the reasons which have influenced me in forming that sentiment. The situation of alien enemies must be disagreeable, inconvenient, and embarrassing to them beyond measure. By the declaration of war in which we are engaged, they are deprived of all their civil rights, they cannot institute a suit for the recovery of their just demands, nor can they repair themselves in damages for any maltreatment they may receive in their persons or property. They are subject and liable, according to a power vested in the President by an act passed in 1798, to be exiled from their homes, their families, and property, to any distant place designated by him within the limits of the United States, or at his pleasure may be ordered entirely out of the country.

And even if they are not removed in the manner I have mentioned, yet they are continually harassed with the marshals' advertisements ordering them to register themselves or be subject to severe and heavy penalties. Those of them in the State that I in part represent, who reside in forty miles of tide water and who are in pursuit of mercantile business and have supported their families by that means, are deprived of the privilege and ordered to desist from the same; indeed, in the town where I reside there is a diversity of opinion whether the tide ebbs and flows within forty miles of it or not; this uncertainty compels those unfortunate persons to cringe to the officers appointed to superintend the business, in order to know their opinion thereon, which state of humiliation is grating and repugnant to the feelings of a free man, and from which I humbly conceive they ought to be relieved.

Sir, I should be glad to know what substantial reason can be given why alien enemies should be thus severely treated, and why they should not be naturalized? There is no law or compact within my knowledge which will either in its letter or spirit be violated by their naturalization, according to the principles of this bill amended as proposed. The law of last session regulating the employment of seamen on board of American vessels, is not at all in any respect affected by it. The first section of that act only prohibits the employment after peace of any seaman, except he is a citizen of the United States, or a man of color, a native of the United States; from which every person will perceive that there is nothing in this section that even hints at a restraint upon our right to naturalize; and after they are naturalized, every one must know they have become citizens and can be employed in the manner contemplated by the act. The only restriction contained in this section is in prohibiting the employment of aliens until they are naturalized, and even this restraint is not imposed upon us until after peace is restored to the country.

The twelfth section of the act is the only one in it that has anything like a bearing upon the question, and a slight examination of it will plainly show that the bill under discussion, with the proposed amendment, will not, in the least, interfere with the provisions of it. That section was particularly intended, according to my understanding of it, as a basis upon which a negotiation for peace should be predicated. And what does this section contain? Nothing more than to restrain us, after the termination of the war,

H. OF R.

The Ways and Means.

from naturalizing any alien who has not resided five years within the United States without leaving of the same; the true construction of which is, that we can naturalize until peace is restored to the country, in the same manner that we could do, before the act of last session was passed; and after peace, we can only naturalize those who have resided five years within the limits of the United States, without leaving the same; and even this restriction is not to be imposed upon us in respect to British subjects, unless that nation adopts a similar arrangement in relation to our citizens.

I think every gentleman ought now to be satisfied that the letter of that act will not be infringed, and I presume it is equally clear, that the policy or spirit of it is also untarnished; (for, in what manner are we to get at the policy of a law but by the law itself?) and by that, it seems, we did not mean to commit ourselves farther than to declare that we would not naturalize any alien, after the termination of the war, who had not resided five years within the United States without leaving the same. Should any arrangement be made upon this proposition, no complaint could be justly urged against us for naturalizing prior to a peace, because it could not be understood from the terms of the proposition that we meant to restrain ourselves before that period, and not even then, unless a like arrangement should be made with respect to our citizens.

But, if it is apprehended that a kindred policy would be violated by the bill, if amended, let gentlemen move a section that none shall be naturalized except they have resided five years within the United States, and that will relieve them from all their difficulty on that score.

Then, sir, if there is no substantial reason against the bill with the proposed amendment, let us examine if there is none in favor of it. In the present situation of the United States, involved in war with a powerful enemy, we stand in need of all the physical force of the country; those men will make good soldiers, and our law authorizes the enlistment of them, and perhaps very properly, too, in the regular army of the United States, requiring only of them an oath of fidelity. But what encouragement do we hold out to them to enter our Army and to fight the battles of our country, when we refuse to naturalize them? Scarcely one. Should they be naturalized by the State governments, as is contended for by some, yet the Government of the United States, unless they acknowledge the State authority in that respect, could not, with propriety, claim them as citizens, and screen them from punishment for treason towards their sovereign in case of capture; but should some of them, from patriotic motives, notwithstanding these disadvantages, enter the service, and doubly hazard their lives, could you, on their return, be willing to treat them as alien enemies, and deprive them of all their civil rights during the continuance of the war, notwithstanding how long it might last? I really hope not. This hard usage would have the effect to sour the minds of those persons that otherwise were well affected towards our country and the cause in which we are engaged. Sound policy, in every view I can take of the subject, seems to require of us to adopt them as citizens; and humanity imperiously demands of us to protect the men we encourage to fight our battles.

Sir, there is a fatality that seems to attend this bill. Formerly, it passed both Houses of Congress, and was rejected by the President. Last session it was postponed from time to time, under various pretences, until it was too late to act upon it; and at this session, it has been committed, laid over, and at last reported in this mutilated shape. Permit me here to observe, that I have understood from good authority, though not from the President himself, that the bill was refused his sanction because it contained no provision for the removal of alien enemies prior to their naturalization, and that he has no objections to the bill in its present shape. It may, perhaps, be improper that I should mention this circumstance in the House, and it is more likely that the information is altogether unnecessary, as I presume every gentleman has the independence to act and think for himself.

The persons intended to be relieved by the bill, generally, were banished from their native land by the oppression and tyranny of their Government; they fled to this as the only asylum for persecuted humanity, and almost at the moment when they conceived themselves safely sheltered from the monstrous storm that had burst upon their unfortunate heads, and when they were consoling themselves with the pleasing idea that their difficulties were surmounted, and the remainder of their lives would be spent in peace, comfort, and happiness, war broke out in their adopted country; they were again threatened with exile and banishment, and there appears to be no resting place for them on the face of the earth.

Sir, those aliens in the part of the country where I live, and for whom I feel so much solicitude, are, generally, Irish by birth; they are gentlemanly in their deportment, well disposed towards the Government of the United States. Some of them have intermarried in the country, and have children—the sure pledges for their fidelity. Many of them are my companions when at home, and I am confident they would defend the rights of the nation as soon as her native sons.

There was a time, Mr. Chairman, when the native-born patriot of America adopted and cherished an Irishman as his fellow-sufferer and fellow citizen, and why do such sentiments not now exist? Are they less generous, brave, or enterprising, or have we only changed situations?

The question being taken on Mr. KENNEDY'S amendment, it was determined in the negative.

The amendment concurred in by the House was then ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read the third time to-day.

United States," was called for by Mr. BIBB; when, a motion was made by Mr. SHEFFEY, that the said bill be postponed indefinitely; and the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 45, nays 72.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill; and, no amendment being made, the bill was ordered to be read the third time.

A motion was made by Mr. HALE that the bill do lie on the table, and negatived. The bill was then read the third time, and passed—yeas 78, nays 46.

DUTIES ON PRIZE GOODS.

Mr. NELSON, from the Committee on the Naval Establishment, reported a bill to repeal the additional duties on goods, wares, and merchandise, captured and brought in by the private armed ships of the United States; which was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON also laid before the House the following letter from the Secretary of the Treasury:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, July 21, 1813.

SIR: The inquiry which forms the basis of your letter of the 20th, can only be answered by the conflict of opinion between the Secretary of the Treasury, in his letter of the 8th of December last, to the honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, and the person now acting in that capacity—a task of no ordinary kind, and which I undertake with great deference.

The data for ascertaining the amount of duties on prize goods, captured by private armed vessels since the declaration of war, is as imperfect as was then stated; the amount of duties on prize goods captured by public as well as private armed vessels, have been blended together.

There is, however, satisfactory ground to infer, that the amount of duties on prize goods, captured by private armed vessels, has rapidly declined, and is certainly, at this time, very inconsiderable.

The causes which have produced this decline may also be a subject of controversy, in which, though I feel that I have the better cause, I apprehend, the weaker argument.

The position assumed by the Secretary is, that "no part of the duties on prize goods ultimately falls on the captors. The duties on importations are paid by the consumers, whether the merchandise be captured by privateers, or regularly imported by merchants." To this I may answer, that the maxim derives more weight from the felicity of argument and commanding character of the great author of "Wealth of Nations," than from the universality of the principle.

It is undoubtedly true in the abstract; but my experience, as a merchant, has taught me to know the practical value of a maxim, derived from an author of a lighter cast:

"What is the worth of anything,
But so much money as 't will bring?"

If an article, from whatever cause, will not sell for the amount of duties, added to the cost and other charges, whether the importation be made regularly by a merchant, in the usual way, or in the cost of equipping and maintaining a privateer, the difference, or loss, will not fall upon the consumer, but upon the importer. This is no uncommon case; indeed, instances are frequent, in which imported articles sell for less than the prime cost and charges, exclusive of the duties. Who pays the duty in this case? The consumer? No; it is paid by the unfortunate importer. Were it otherwise, there would be no bankruptcies; your merchants would have but one side to their profit and loss account. "These are the accidental exceptions arising from such a superabundance of a particular article, as will sink it below the prime cost and charges." And this has actually been the case with many prize importations. Indeed, it is said, and I believe with truth, that, in some of the Southern ports, the duties and the charges of sale have absorbed nearly the whole proceeds.

"The price for exportation, in which case no duty is paid," forms but a very partial exception in this case; for, when you have little or no export of foreign products, the benefit of drawback is lost.

The Secretary has said, that "a reduction of duties will be of no use to the privateers, unless the merchandise continues to be sold at the same price as if the duties had not been reduced." This is not strictly the fact. It is well known, in the actual market, that coffee, for instance, subject to ten cents per pound duty, and entitled to drawback, seldom sells for more than four cents over the price for consumption, and this must continue until the excess is very great, or the exportation free, which is not likely to be the case during the war. The equality of price approximates as the obstacles to exportation increase; and if exportation was prohibited, or completely obstructed, the equality of price between the same kind of merchandise, entitled to drawback, or sold for consumption, would be absolute.

The lower the price of the article, the greater the consumption. The American people, enjoying the means, indulge their taste for variety, and habituate themselves to every kind of luxury. This produces an accommodation of taste, which changes, with great facility, from the use of coffee to tea, from brandy to rum, &c., as abundance or scarcity and price shall indicate.

The question is not now, "simply, whether it be necessary and proper to pay from the Treasury to the privateers, a bounty equal to the amount of the reduction of duties on prize goods," for there is, literally now, a very trifling amount of duties collected on prize goods; and, therefore, any encouragement of this nature given by Government to private armed vessels, will, if any prize arrive, bring money into, instead of extracting it from, the Treasury, and, therefore, so far from the payment of a bounty for the purpose of encouraging privateers, the Government will receive an amount of duties on prize goods, which otherwise would not be brought into our ports.

The Secretary observes that, "if the article be not worth sending into port after capture, it must be altogether impossible for the importing merchant to pay its prime cost, freight, and insurance; and, with those charges, to import such an article without considerable loss." An article may not be worth sending in, after capture, in consequence of the heavy charges and great risk, perhaps equal to a premium of fifty to seventy-five per cent., whilst the importing merchant may import the same article in neutral bottoms, at a premium of ten per cent., and receive his goods at little more than the ordinary charges previous to the declaration of war. He, moreover, has the advantage of selling at such a time, and on such terms, as his interest may dictate, and to his regular customers; whereas, prize goods are necessarily brought to the hammer, and sold in large parcels, to speculators, uncontrolled by the prudent management of mercantile superintendence, frequently from twenty to thirty per cent. less than those of the regular importer. These causes operate as a bounty in favor of the regular importer, and against the captors. The owner of a privateer receives but a moiety of the captured property; the cost of that moiety to him, is the cost of the equipment, maintenance, insurance, wear and tear, and depreciation of his privateer, (all which is very extravagant,) and the insurance, duties, and other heavy charges, on his prize.

The cause of the present inquiry proves the error of the Secretary's prediction, "that a greater number of privateers will, without bounty, continue to be employed, than is necessary for the greatest possible annoyance of the enemy's trade."

The fact is, that, from causes that occupy the present discussion, privateering is nearly at an end; and, from the best observation I have been enabled to make, it is more from the deficiency of remuneration in the net proceeds of their prizes, than from the vigilance and success of the enemy in recapturing. One-fourth part of the year, at least, the elements will raise the blockade of our ports, and it is at that season that the harvest and the reapers are most abundant and successful in privateering.

There is sometimes wisdom in taking counsel from our enemy, and his dread of our privateers may be collected from the marked hostility and severity of treatment which the crews of privateers are subject to, when captured, and the insidious efforts to excite prejudices against them. The analogy between privateering and lotteries, does not appear to me to be so strict as the Secretary seems to consider it. The adventure of a privateer is of the nature of a commercial project or speculation, conducted by commercial men, upon principles of mercantile calculation and profit. The vessel and her equipment is an object of great expense, which is expected to be remunerated by the probable chances of profit, after calculating the outfit, insurance, &c., as in a regular mercantile voyage, as much so as the voyage of a letter of marque, with a cargo, running all the chances of hostility, and incurring the consequent heavy charges of war.

I do not think a "reduction of duties, by increasing the profit, would operate as an insurance on the risk of collusive or pretended captures of British prohibited merchandise," to such an extent as to warrant the withholding any proper encouragement to this most potent weapon of annoyance to the enemy, which we possess. Frauds no doubt may be committed, but, in the existing absolute prohibition of all British merchandise, from whatever quarter, there is a much stronger inducement to collusion than can be found in the reduction of one half the duties in favor of prizes; and no doubt frauds are committed; yet these considerations are not deemed of sufficient importance to induce a repeal or relaxation of the system.

The number of accessaries to the fraud; the risk of capture, by the vessels of the enemy, who do not participate in the profits of the collusion; the vigilance of our own cruisers, officers, and prize courts, appear to afford a very reasonable security against the practice, to any very injurious extent. And the humane, generous, and gallant conduct of our citizens, employed in private armed vessels, proves a moral sense which merits more confidence and liberality than has been awarded to them.

I will not undertake to say that the reduction of the duties in favor of prizes captured by private armed vessels is the proper or only encouragement to be provided. I repeat the fact, that, as a question of revenue, the nation has everything to gain, and nothing to lose. One of the most efficient means of distressing the commercial and military marine of the enemy, is the capture and detention of his seamen, as well to enhance the difficulty of manning his ships, as to provide for the exchange, and to retain hostages, to insure the proper treatment of our own. Whatever encouragement may be devised for the destruction of the ships of the enemy on the ocean, and bringing into port his captured seamen, will inflict the deepest possible wound upon his commerce and marine—the vitals of his resources and power. I have the honor to be, &c.

W. JONES,

Acting Secretary of Treasury.

The said resolution was read twice, and ordered to be engrossed, and read the third time to-day.

THE WAYS AND MEANS.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill authorizing a loan for a sum not exceeding — dollars. The bill was reported with an amendment thereto, by filling the blank with the words "seven millions five hundred thousand;" which was concurred in by the House.

A motion was then made by Mr. OAKLEY, to amend the bill by striking out the fourth section, and, in lieu thereof, to insert the following as the fourth section:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That so much of the proceeds of the direct tax, and of the internal duties, which have been imposed by the several acts passed, or to be passed, during the present session of Congress, as shall be necessary to defray the interest of the loan which may be made in pursuance of this act, be, and the same is hereby, pledged for the payment of the said interest.

And the question to agree to the said amendment being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 19, nays 94, as follows:

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time to-day; and was read a third time, and passed.

MONDAY, July 26.

The bill "to authorize the sale of a lot of ground lying in the borough of Pittsburgh, in the State of Pennsylvania," was passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; as also was the bill for the relief of George Lyon; and both bills were subsequently read a third time, and passed.

Mr. EPES reported a bill, making additional appropriations for the support of Government during the year 1813; which was read twice, and committed.

The bill for the relief of Thomas Denny passed through a Committee of the Whole; was ordered to a third reading; and was read the third time, and passed.

The bill "for reducing the duties payable on prize goods captured by the private armed vessels of the United States," passed through a Committee of the Whole. After the rejection of a motion made by Mr. BENSON, to postpone the bill to the first Monday in December next, and considerable discussion, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House took up the amendments of the Senate to the direct tax law; agreed to a part of the same, and rejected the remainder.

The bill from the Senate, for the relief of the owners of the Amelia Island vessels, the Good Friends, &c., was read a third time, as amended by the House, and passed.

Mr. TROUP reported a bill explanatory of the bill for raising certain corps of mounted rangers; which was read three times and passed.

The House spent some time in Committee of the Whole, on the bill making further appropriations for the support of Government for the year 1813, but rose without coming to a decision thereon, and obtained leave to sit again.

[Considerable discussion took place on the compensation proposed to be allowed as an outfit to Mr. Adams, as one of the Russian Mission. The objection was, that, as he already receives a salary as Resident Minister, no other compensation is necessary in addition on account of his recent appointment.]

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, "laying duties on notes of banks, bankers, and certain companies, on bonds, notes, and obligations, discounted by banks, bankers, and certain companies, and on bills of exchange of certain descriptions," with amendments. The Senate have concurred in the amendment proposed by this House to the bill, "supplementary to the several acts heretofore passed on the subject of an uniform rule of Naturalization," with an amendment; in all which amendments they desire the concurrence of this House. The Senate have insisted on their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill "to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States;" ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and have appointed managers at the conference on their part.

DUTIES ON PRIZE GOODS.

The engrossed bill, "for reducing the duties payable on prize goods captured by the private armed vessels of the United States," was read a third time.

CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. FISK, from the Committee of Elections, made a further report on the contested election between THOMAS M. BAYLY, of Virginia, and BURWELL BASSETT; and the said report having been debated at considerable length, it was, on motion of Mr. McKIM, Resolved, That the said report be recommitted to the Committee of Elections, with instructions to inquire into the legality of the election in the county of Accomac; and that the committee have leave to sit during the sitting of the House.

The vote on recommitment stood—for recommitment 51, against it 50.

The report was as follows:

That no evidence has been exhibited to the committee to disprove the statement of facts made in the former report, viz: "that there was neither rain, nor the rising of the water-courses, to prevent the electors from attending on the first day of the election in the said county of Accomac." The legality of the election in that county must, therefore, rest on the ground, that a greater number of electors attended than could be polled on said day.

To prove that all the electors who attended on the first day, might have been polled on said day, the petitioner has produced the accompanying depositions, from No. 4 to No. 9, inclusive, which, in substance, state, that the election commenced between 9 and 10 o'clock in the morning; in about one hour after it was interrupted fifteen or twenty minutes, with the consent of the candidates, by an address made by Levin E.

Parker to the electors, in favor of Mr. Bassett; that except this, it proceeded with great order and rapidity from the commencement, save a few minutes' intermission several times during the day, while the qualification of an elector was inquired into, or when no voter offered, until about five o'clock in the afternoon, when voting became very slow; and but two or three votes were given in the course of half an hour, though proclamation was several times made, and the sheriff frequently requested persons to vote. That, at the setting of the sun, there were present the two undersheriffs, and two other persons only who were qualified to vote, who had not voted; and it was represented to the sheriff that some of the voters had gone home, under the expectation that the poll would be continued; a continuance took place; it was asked for by the friends of Mr. Bayly, and objected to by Mr. Bassett's, as also now by himself, on the ground that it was unnecessary and illegal.

On the other hand, it is contended by the sitting member that the propriety or necessity of an adjournment, to fulfil the spirit or intention of the law, is a matter left to the sound discretion of the sheriff, which, in the present case, had been properly exercised; that the presence of four, or any number of legal voters, not having voted, and claiming the right to vote, at the close of the poll on the first day, furnished such reasons and grounds for the continuance, as had been approved by universal practice through the State, and sanctioned by the Legislature. In support of which he produced a list of the election polls, taken in various counties, at different times, and on different occasions, in the State, accompanied by certificates from some of the clerks who kept the same; also, the testimony of Messrs. Caperton and White, members of this House, and a certificate from the petitioner, acknowledging that the said election in Accomac was conducted with honesty and impartiality.

However desirous the committee may be to sanction the general usage of the State, and respect the construction given to its law by its Legislature, they look in vain for that usage or construction in the evidence exhibited by the sitting member. Among the cases he presents no two agree, nor does any one of them compare with the one under consideration. This diversity denies us the aid of precedent, and leaves this case, as it probably will all others of a like nature, to be decided according to its own particular merits.

The law of Virginia forbids voting after sunset on the day of election, and requires the poll to be closed on the first day, unless the electors are prevented from attending by the providential interposition of rain, or the rising of water-courses, or when more electors attend than can be polled in one day; in either of which cases, and then only, the sheriff is authorized to continue the poll.

It is presumed that those exceptions in the law were intended to favor those who, after due diligence, were unable to exercise their elective franchise, but was never designed to indulge the negligent, or protect the fraudulent. With this view of the law and the evidence before us, no difficulty is found in deciding the present case. The day was fine, the election progressed with great order and rapidity; by five o'clock in the afternoon nearly all had voted; although proclamation was several times made, and the sheriff frequently called for voters, yet but few voted for the last hour or two, and, for the space of about half an hour, only two voted. At the close of the polls there were present but four persons who had not voted, two of them deputy sheriffs, who had been attending the whole day, and nothing appears but that the other two had or might have attended at the same time. Why did not those four vote during the day, or the last hour of it, when few voted, and particularly during the half hour in which only two voted? It was surely the want of disposition, and not the want of time, which prevented them. With these facts before us, can it be said that more electors attended than could be polled in one day? Certainly not; and no other cause is pretended or attempted to be shown for the adjournment. Under these circumstances the committee do not hesitate to say, that the said continuance of the poll in the county of Accomac was improper, and not warranted by law, and that all the votes given subsequent to the said continuance are illegal. They, therefore, respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That the adjournment of the poll in Accomac county, in the election between Burwell Bassett and Thomas M. Bayly, was illegal, and that the votes taken in that county subsequent to the said adjournment ought to be set aside."

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. NELSON:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to examine and report on the propriety of conferring public honors on the memory of James Lawrence, late Captain of the United States frigate Chesapeake, and of Zebulon M. Pike, late a Brigadier General in the Armies of the United States, whose distinguished death in the service of their country add lustre to the character of the American nation; the propriety of adopting, as the peculiar children of the Republic, the sons of these distinguished heroes, and the propriety of making provision for the support and comfort of the families of these deceased officers.

The resolution was read, and debate arising thereon, the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, July 28.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have insisted on their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill "laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise;" and ask a conference upon the subject-matter of the said amendments.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, insisting upon certain of their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill "to lay and collect a direct tax within the United States:" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House do insist on their disagreement to the said amendments, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate upon the subject-matter thereof; and that Mr. BIBB, Mr. TAYLOR, and Mr. ROBERTS, be appointed managers at the said conference, on the part of this House.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, insisting on certain of their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill "laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise:" Whereupon,

13th CON. 1st SESS.—16

Resolved, That this House do insist on their disagreement to the said amendments, and agree to the conference requested by the Senate upon the subject-matter thereof; and that Mr. BIBB, Mr. TAYLOR, and Mr. ROBERTS, be appointed managers at the same, on the part of this House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill "laying duties on notes of banks, bankers, and certain companies, and on bills of exchange of certain descriptions," were read, and agreed to in part and disagreed to in part.

The amendment proposed by the Senate to the amendment of this House to the bill "supplementary to the several acts heretofore passed upon the subject of an uniform rule of naturalization," was read, and disagreed to by the House.

The resolution submitted yesterday, by Mr. NELSON, was ordered to lie on the table.

APPROPRIATION BILL.

The House again in Committee of the Whole on the additional appropriation bill. The amount of $43,000 proposed to be appropriated to defray expenses of the Russian mission, was reduced to $38,500, with a view of allowing to John Q. Adams, for his services on said mission, $4,500 instead of the usual outfit of $9,000 proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means to be allowed to him.

A motion was made by Mr. WRIGHT to amend the bill by adding thereto the following proviso:

Provided, That no compensation be made to John Q. Adams, Minister Resident, unless the British Government agree to send a Minister or Ministers to the mediation of the Emperor of Russia: And, provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury receive no part of the salary of the Secretary of the Treasury during the time he shall be absent from the seat of Government on said mission."

And the question being taken on said motion, was decided in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. SHEFFEY to add the following proviso to the end of a section of the bill:

Provided, That nothing in this or any other act contained shall be construed to authorize any allowance to the Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States, resident at the Court of St. Petersburg, for any services as Minister to negotiate a Treaty of Peace with Great Britain, beyond the sum of $4,500, included in the appropriation hereinbefore mentioned; which sum is hereby authorized to be paid to the said Minister, if the President shall deem it proper."

And, after much debate, the question thereon being taken by yeas and yeas, it appeared that there were for the amendment 55, against it 55, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dayly of Virginia, Benson, Bigelow, Breckenridge, Brigham, Caperton, Caldwell, Champion, Chappell, Cilley, Culpeper, Davenport, Desha, Duvall, Ely, Farrow, Forney, Forsyth, Gloninger, Goldsborough, Hall, Hawes, Hufty, Hungerford, Jackson of Rhode Island, Kent of New York, King of Massachusetts, Lewis, Lovett, Macon, Montgomery, Moseley, Oakley, Ormsby, Pearson, Pickering, Pickens, Piper, Pitkin, Potter, John Reed, Richardson,

And be it further enacted, That the sum of fifty thousand dollars, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, be, and the same is hereby, appropriated.

THURSDAY, July 29.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the bill from the Senate "to prohibit the use of licenses or passes, granted by the authority of the Government of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," without amendment, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the whole House.

An engrossed bill making additional appropriations for the support of Government, during the year 1813, was read the third time, and passed.

An engrossed bill allowing a bounty to the owners, officers, and crews, of the private armed vessels, was read the third time, and passed.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, making compensation for wagons captured or destroyed by the enemy at Detroit. Before the Committee had gone through the bill, it was announced that a communication from the Senate of a confidential nature was in waiting; on which the Committee rose, reported progress, and the doors were closed for a few minutes, when they were again opened.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate insist on their amendments, disagreed to by this House, to the bill "laying duties on notes of banks, bankers, and certain companies, on notes, bonds, and obligations, discounted by banks, bankers, and certain companies, and on bills of exchange of certain descriptions," and ask a conference upon the subject-matter of the said amendments.

The House proceeded to consider the message from the Senate, insisting on their amendments disagreed to by this House, to the bill "laying duties on notes of banks, bankers, and certain companies, on bonds, notes, and obligations, discounted by banks, bankers, and certain companies, and on bills of exchange of certain descriptions;" Whereupon,

Resolved, That this House doth insist on their disagreement to the said amendments, and agree to the conference asked by the Senate upon the subject-matter thereof, and that Mr. BIBB, Mr. TAYLOR, and Mr. ROBERTS, be appointed managers on the part of this House.

Mr. BIBB, from the managers appointed to confer with the managers on the part of the Senate, on the subject-matter of the amendments depending between the two Houses to the bill "laying duties on licenses to retailers of wines, spirituous liquors, and foreign merchandise," made a report; which was ordered to lie on the table.

BRITISH LICENSES.

The House went into Committee of the Whole, on the bill to prohibit the use of licenses or passes issued by the Government of Great Britain.

After several ineffectual attempts to amend the bill, the Committee rose and reported it without amendment.

A motion was then made, by Mr. PITKIN, to amend the bill by inserting a new section, to come in after the second section of the bill, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That, whenever any ship or vessel, seized and detained by virtue of this act, and for a violation of the same, by any private armed vessel of the United States, shall be acquitted on trial, it shall be in the power of the court before which such trial is had, in case it shall appear to such court that such seizure and detention was made without probable cause, to order the captors to pay to the owners of such ship or vessel such damages, for such seizure and detention, as they may judge just and reasonable.

And the question thereon being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was made, by Mr. OAKLEY, to amend the bill by inserting, after the word "appear," in the eighth line of the second section, the words, "by the discovery, on board, of any such license, pass, or other instrument."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

Another motion was made, by Mr. OAKLEY, to amend the bill by inserting, after the word "Ire-

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 38, nays 70, as follows:

A motion was made, by Mr. PICKERING, to amend the bill by striking out the words "the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland," and to insert the words, "any foreign nation."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was then made by Mr. PICKERING, to amend the bill by inserting the words, "owners, officers, and crew, of such," in the 15th line of the second section, after the word "or," and before the word "private."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

FRIDAY, July 30.

Mr. TROUP reported a bill authorizing the appointment of certain officers of the Army by the President of the United States during the recess of Congress, (viz. the officers of the five regiments changed by an act of the present session from twelve months' to five years' men,) and the bill was twice read and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was subsequently read a third time and passed.

Mr. FISK, from the Committee of Elections, made a report, according to instruction, on the petition of Burwell Bassett, contesting the election of Thomas M. Bayly. The report pronounces that the election in Accomac county, in Virginia, was illegally held, and therefore ought to be set aside.

Mr. BENSON moved that the consideration of the report be postponed to the first Monday in December next, and the said motion was decided in the affirmative.

A message was received from the Senate, announcing that they had passed the resolution for adjournment, with an amendment fixing on Monday next, as the day for adjournment.

Mr. McKIM moved that the amendment lie on the table. After some conversation, the motion was negatived, 63 to 41. The amendment of the Senate was agreed to by a large majority.

Mr. BRUB, from the Committee of Conference on the Direct Tax bill, made a report, which was read and concurred in by the Senate. The difference between the Houses, on the other tax bills, have also been compromised.

A message was received from the Senate, stating their passage of the Loan bill, with a small amendment, which was read and concurred in.

The report of the Committee of Ways and Means on the petition of John Dorsey, was discussed in Committee, and the following resolution ultimately adopted and referred to a committee to bring in a bill:

"Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought to be granted."

On motion of Mr. FINDLEY,

Resolved, That the Clerk of this House be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the contingent fund, to such persons as have been in the employ of the Doorkeeper during the present session, in addition to their daily pay, and to John Oswald Dunn, the sum of thirty-five dollars each, for their services.

EXPORTATION OF PROVISIONS.

Mr. NEWTON rose to offer a resolution on the subject of prohibiting the exportation of provisions and naval stores. He was constrained to introduce it at this late period of the session from a conviction of its importance and necessity. The proposition for a general embargo had been rejected, and the bill prohibiting the use of licenses had had the effect, hermetically, to seal our ports against the egress of our own vessels. The consequence would be, that British vessels would assume the neutral character, and a fraudulent intercourse would be carried on with the enemy, to favor which Porto Rico and Guadaloupe had been recently ceded to Sweden, to make them entrepôts for this commerce with the enemy carried on under the disguise of the neutral flag. Mr. N. wished to prevent the enemy, now hovering on our coast, from receiving supplies in this collusive manner, and, by making the war more decisive in its character, to bring it to an earlier termination. With these views, he moved the adoption of the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Committee of Foreign Relations be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting the exportation of provisions and naval stores in foreign bottoms, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The House agreed, by yeas and nays, to consider the resolution.

On suggestion of Mr. GRUNDY, seconded by Mr. CALHOUN, the resolution was so amended as to refer the subject thereof to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, instead of the Committee of Foreign Relations.

Mr. WRIGHT and Mr. BIGELOW opposed the object of the motion with some warmth.

A motion was made to postpone indefinitely the further consideration of the resolve ; and the question thereon having been taken by yeas and nays, was decided as follows: For indefinite postponement 59, against it 53.

So the resolution was indefinitely postponed ; in other words, rejected.

DIPLOMATIC EXPENSES, &c.

The following resolutions were submitted for consideration by Mr. EPPES :

1. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, copies of the accounts of the different Ministers Plenipotentiary, Envoys Extraordinary, Secretaries of Legation, and Consuls, appointed under the authority of the United States, from the commencement of the present Government; with a statement of the sum allowed to each, under the different items of outfit, salary, and contingencies, including the items of the contingent expenses, and any other information tending to show the principles on which such accounts have been adjusted and settled.

2. Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a detailed account of the expenses incurred in the Treaty with Algiers, including the several sums paid to the Dey of Algiers, and the items of the contingent expenses attending the same.

3. Resolved, That the Secretary of War be instructed to prepare, and lay before this House, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a general view of the unsettled accounts in the offices of Paymaster and Accountant of the War Department, distinguishing the amount of such accounts, the period at which they have been presented for settlement, and to suggest any measures which he may consider necessary to secure the accountability of public agents, and prevent the future accumulation of unsettled accounts in the offices of the Paymaster General or Accountant of the War Department.

4. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be instructed to prepare, and lay before this House, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a general view of the unsettled accounts in the office of Accountant of the Navy Department, distinguishing the amount of such accounts, and the period at which they have been presented, and to suggest such measures as he may consider necessary to secure the accountability of public agents, and prevent the future accumulation of unsettled accounts in that office.

5. Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be instructed to prepare, and report to this House, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a general view of the unsettled accounts in the office of Auditor of the United States, distinguishing the amount of such accounts, the period at which they have been presented, and to suggest such measures as he may consider necessary to prevent the future accumulation of unsettled accounts in that office.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, the first resolution was amended by inserting the words "Secretaries of Legation," after the words "Envoys Extraordinary."

On motion of Mr. PICKERING, the second resolution was amended by adding to the end thereof, the following : "and all other expenditures in relation to the Barbary Powers, including those occasioned by the war with Tripoli, and the making of a peace with that Regency."

The above resolutions were then agreed to, as amended.

Ordered, That Messrs. EPPES and PITKIN be appointed a committee to present the said resolutions to the President of the United States.

SATURDAY, July 31.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "making further provision for the collection of internal duties, and for the appointment and compensation of assessors;" also, the bill to provide for the widows and orphans of militia slain, and for militia disabled in the service of the United States;" and also the bill "concerning invalid pensioners;" with amendments to each, in which they desire the concurrence of this House.

The amendments to all these bills were read, and concurred in by the House.

Mr. McKIM reported a bill for the relief of Joshua Dorsey ; which was read three times, and passed.

The further consideration of the supplementary report of the Committee of Elections on the contested election of J. P. HUNGERFORD was, on motion of Mr. SHEFFEY, postponed to the first day of the next session.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill "giving further time for registering claims to land in the late district of Arkansas, in the Territory of Missouri, and for other purposes;" also, the bill "for the relief of the officers and crew of the late United States' brig Vixen;" also, the bill "supplementary to the act, entitled 'An act for the better regulation of the ordnance;" with amendments to each.

BRITISH BARBARITIES.

Mr. MACON, from the committee to whom was referred that part of the President's Message which relates to the spirit and manner in which the war has been waged by the enemy, made a report, including a voluminous mass of testimony on the subject. The report is as follows:

The committee, to whom was referred that part of the President's Message, which relates to the spirit and manner in which the war has been waged by the enemy, report:

That they have collected and arranged all the testimony on this subject which could at this time be procured. This testimony is submitted to the consideration of the House, arranged under the following heads:

1. Bad treatment of American prisoners;
2. Detention of American prisoners as British subjects, on the plea of nativity in the dominions of Great Britain, or of naturalization;
3. Detention of mariners as prisoners of war, who were in England when the war was declared;
4. Compulsory service of impressed American seamen on board British ships of war;
5. Violation of flags of truce;
6. Ransom of American prisoners from Indians in the British service;
7. Pillage and destruction of private property on the Chesapeake Bay, and in the neighboring country;
8. Massacre and burning of American prisoners surrendered to officers of Great Britain, by Indians in the British service; abandonment of the remains of Americans killed in battle, or murdered after the surrender to the British; the pillage and shooting of American citizens, and the burning of their houses after surrender to the British under the guarantee of protection;
9. Outrages at Hampton, in Virginia.

The evidence under the first head demonstrates that the British Government has adopted a rigor of regulation unfriendly to the comfort, and apparently unnecessary to the safekeeping of American prisoners generally. It shows, also, instances of a departure from the customary rules of war by the selection and confinement in close prisons of particular persons, and the transportation of them for undefined causes from the ports of the British colonies to the island of Great Britain.

The evidence under the second head establishes the fact, that however the practice of detaining American citizens as British subjects may be regarded as to the principle it involves, that such detentions continue to occur through the agency of the naval and other commanders of that Government. It proves, too, that however unwilling to allow other nations to naturalize her subjects, Great Britain is disposed to enforce the obligation entered into by their citizens when naturalized under her own laws. This practice, even supposing the release of every person thus detained, obviously subjects our captured citizens, upon mere suspicion, to hardships and perils from which they ought to be exempt according to the established rules in relation to prisoners of war.

The evidence under the third head shows, that while all other American citizens were permitted to depart within a reasonable time after the declaration of war, all mariners who were in the dominions of Great Britain, whether they resorted to her ports in time of peace for lawful purposes, or were forced into them under pretence of illegal commerce, are considered prisoners of war. The injustice of this exception is not more apparent than the jealousy it discloses towards that useful class of our fellow-citizens. But the committee can but remark, that if the practice of hiring American seamen to navigate British vessels is generally adopted and authorized, and that it is suffered, appears from the advertisement of George Maude, the British agent at Port Royal, which is to be found with the testimony collected under the first head, that the naval strength of that empire will be increased in proportion to the number of our seamen in bondage. The present war having changed the relation of the two countries, the pretended right of impressment can no longer be exercised, but the same end may be accomplished by the substitution of this mode. Every seaman thus employed (the terms of whose engagement have not been ascertained) increases the naval strength of the enemy, not only by depriving the United States of his active services, but by enabling Great Britain to carry on and even extend her commerce without diminishing the number of sailors employed in her vessels of war.

The testimony collected under the fourth head proves, that it is the ordinary practice of the officers of British armed vessels to force impressed Americans to serve against their country by threats, by corporal punishment, and even by the fear of immediate execution; an instructing commentary upon the professions of the Government of its readiness to release impressed American seamen found on board ships of war!

On the evidence collected under the fifth head, it is only necessary to observe that, in one case, the case of Dr. McKeehan, the enormity is increased by the circumstances of the flag being divested of everything of a hostile character, having solely for its object the relief of the wounded and suffering prisoners who were taken at the river Raisin, on the 22d January, 1813. The treatment of Dr. McKeehan, not by the allies of Great Britain, but by the officers of her army, can only be rationally accounted for by the supposition, that it was considered good policy to deter American surgeons from going to the relief of their countrymen, as the Indian surgeons had a more speedy and effectual mode of relieving their sufferings.

The evidence respecting the ransom of American prisoners from Indians, collected under the sixth head, deserves attention, principally from the policy it indicates, and as it is connected with Indian cruelties. Considering the savages as an auxiliary military force, in the pay of Great Britain, the amount of ransom may be regarded as part of their stipulated compensation for military service; and as ransoms would be increased and their value enhanced by the terror inspired by the most shocking barbarities, it may be fairly concluded, whatever may be the intention of the British Government, that the practice of redeeming captives by pecuniary means will be occasionally quickened by the butchery of our fellow-citizens, and by indignities offered to their remains; as long as the Indians are employed by the enemy. The justice of this conclusion is confirmed by the testimony of those witnesses who were retained after ransom as prisoners of war.

The testimony collected under the seventh head shows, that the private property of unarmed citizens has been pillaged by the officers and crews of the British vessels of war on our coast, their houses burnt, and places of public worship mutilated and defiled. It appears that the officers, animated by the presence of Admiral Cockburn, particularly distinguished themselves in these exploits. This evidence proves, that they were governed by the combined motives of avarice and revenge; not satisfied with bearing off, for their own convenience, the valuable articles found, the others which furnished no allurements to their cupidity, were wantonly defaced and destroyed. It has been alleged, in palliation of these acts of wanton cruelty, that a flag sent on shore by the Admiral was fired upon by the American militia. The evidence proves this not to be the fact. This pretence has been resorted to only to excuse conduct which no circumstances can justify.

The Committee forbear to make any observations upon the testimony collected under the eighth head, from a perfect conviction that no person of this or any other nation can read the simple narrative of the different witnesses of the grossest violations of honor, justice, and humanity, without the strongest emotions of indignation and horror. That these outrages were perpetrated by Indians, is neither palliation nor excuse. Every civilized nation is answerable for the conduct of the allies under their command, and while they partake of the advantages of their success, they are equally partakers of the odium of their crimes. The British forces concerned in the affair of the 22d, at the river Raisin, are more deeply implicated in the infamy of these transactions than by this mode of reasoning, however correct. The massacre of the 23d January, after the capitulation, was perpetrated without any exertion on their part to prevent it; indeed, it is apparent, from all the circumstances, that if the British officers did not connive at their destruction, they were criminally indifferent about the fate of the wounded prisoners. But what marks more strongly the degradation of the character of the British soldiers, is the refusal of the last offices of humanity to the bodies of the dead. The bodies of our countrymen were exposed to every indignity, and became food for brutes in the sight of men who affect a sacred regard to the dictates of honor and religion. Low indeed is the character of that army which is reduced to the confession, that their savage auxiliaries will not permit them to perform the rites of sepulture to the slain. The Committee have not been able to discover even the expression of that detestation which such conduct must inspire from the military or civil authority on the Canadian frontier, unless such detestation is to be presumed from the choice of an Indian trophy as an ornament for the Legislative Hall of Upper Canada.

The Committee have considered it their duty to submit the evidence collected under the ninth head, of the atrocities committed at Hampton, although these enormities have been committed since their appointment. These barbarities may be rationally considered as the consequence of the example set by the officers of the naval force on our coast. Human turpitude is always progressive, and soldiers are prepared for the perpetration of the most dreadful crimes by the commission of minor offences with impunity. That troops who had been instigated by the example of their officers, to plunder the property and burn the houses of unarmed citizens, should proceed to rape and murder, need not excite surprise, however it may inspire horror. For every detestable violation of humanity an excuse is fabricated or found. The wounded prisoners on the Northern frontier were massacred by Indians; the sick murdered, and the women violated, at Hampton, by the foreign troops in the pay of Great Britain. These pretences, admitting them to be true, are as disgraceful as the conduct which made a resort to them necessary. Honor and magnanimity not only forbid the soldier to perpetrate crimes, but require every exertion on his part to prevent them. If, in defiance of discipline, acts of violence are committed upon any individual entitled to protection, the exemplary punishment of the offender can alone vindicate the reputation of the nation by whom he is employed. Whether such exertions were made by the British soldiers, or the character of the British nation thus vindicated, the evidence will show.

The shrieks of the innocent victims of infernal lust at Hampton were heard by the American prisoners, but were too weak to reach the ears or disturb the repose of the British officers, whose duty, as men, required them to protect every female whom the fortune of war had thrown into their power. The Committee will not dwell on this hateful subject. Human language affords no terms strong enough to express the emotions which the examination of this evidence has awakened; they rejoice that these acts have appeared so incredible to the American people. And for the honor of human nature they deeply regret that the evidence so clearly establishes their truth. In the correspondence between the commander of the American and British forces will be found what is equivalent to an admission of the facts by the British commander. The Committee have yet to learn that the punishment of the offenders has followed the conviction of their guilt. The power of retaliation being vested by law in the Executive Magistrate, no measure is considered necessary to be proposed, but the resolution annexed to this report.

As such enormities, instead of inspiring terror as was probably intended, are, in the opinion of the Committee, calculated to produce a contrary effect, they submit for the consideration of the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to have collected and presented to this House, during the continuance of the present war, evidence of every departure by the enemy from the ordinary modes of conducting war among civilized nations.

The resolution was agreed to, and a committee appointed to present the same to the President.

On motion of Mr. GRUNDY, 5000 copies of said report were ordered to be printed for the use of the members.

[See Appendix for the documents.]

PROPERTY LOST AT DETROIT.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate "making compensation for wagons and teams captured or destroyed by the enemy at Detroit," and on the report of the Committee of Claims thereon; and, after some time spent therein, the Committee rose, and reported their disagreement to the said report, and agreed to the bill without amendment.

Mr. McLEAN, said that, urged by a sense of duty, he rose for the purpose of asking this committee not to concur in the report of the Committee of Claims. Nothing was further from my expectation (said he) than an unfavorable report upon this subject. The justice of the claims for which the bill is intended to provide, had been presented to my mind in such a striking manner, that I had not supposed the Committee of Claims would have hesitated in sanctioning the bill, nor this House in passing it; and, notwithstanding the unfavorable impression entertained by the Committee of Claims, I flatter myself, that this committee will only require an acquaintance with the merits of the claims specified in the bill, to convince them that the Committee of Claims in rejecting the bill have proceeded upon mistaken premises.

When a resolution was submitted by me some weeks ago on this subject, I was under an impression that the great proportion of these wagons and teams had been taken into the service by actual impressment; but, on further examination into the evidence submitted to the Committee of Claims, and on conversing with the then acting Quartermaster General, I find my impression was not altogether correct. And I cannot refrain from expressing my gratification that on this point I had been misinformed.

It will be recollected that, in the Spring of the year 1812, a detachment principally composed of Ohio militia was organized and placed under the command of General Hull. No sooner was it announced to the citizens of Ohio that their country required their services, than a sufficient number voluntarily sacrificed the scenes of domestic happiness, and tendered their services. The ranks were immediately filled. The same spirit of patriotism which induced citizens to make a tender of their personal services, influenced others to make a like sacrifice, and render a service with their property. At the time the contract was made between the owners of these wagons and teams and the agents of the Government, it was understood by both parties that, in the event of a loss, a remuneration would be made. An assurance to this effect was given to the owners of this property, not only by the Quartermaster General, but by the Commander-in-Chief of the Army. That a remuneration was intended in the event of a loss, the owners of the property had a right to conclude, not only from the express assurances given, but from the fact of the property being valued. What purpose was the valuation intended to answer? Certainly it was not a mere form. No object could be obtained by it, unless it were intended as a criterion for compensation, should the property become lost. Under these impressions, many citizens, without being impressed, engaged their wagons and teams in the public service. It was not expected that their services would be required farther than the Rapids of the Miami of the Lake. From that place it was calculated to transport the baggage of the army by water; and I am informed it was thought by many, teams could have been discharged short of the rapids. The owners of these teams were not induced to enter into this contract through motives of speculation; they were aware of some of the many difficulties they would have to encounter. The march of the army led through a wilderness filled with obstacles. To have engaged in such a service under a contract that did not secure them in some measure from loss, would have been doing injustice to themselves and to their families. They were patriotic—they were willing to share in the dangers of the army; but to have expected more than a personal risk, to have required a risk of their property engaged in the service, would have been imposing on them a burden too heavy to be borne. On the arrival of the army at the Rapids of the Miami, many of the owners of wagons and teams were anxious to return. They had not calculated on progressing farther—their teams had become worsted by fatigue, and for want of forage. Some were discharged; others were compelled to go by positive command. They had no control over their property, either as to the manner of its employment, or the duration of its service. They were compelled to render as implicit obedience to the Commander-in-Chief as the soldier in the ranks. They progressed with the army to Detroit, and continued in its service until the disgraceful surrender. Their wagons and teams were taken by the enemy; not as private property, but as property belonging to the Government, or for which it was liable to the respective owners. The enemy will never admit that, in the seizure of this property, they violated the articles of capitulation. A regular list of the owners of these teams was made out—they were considered as being attached to the army—they shared in its dangers—they participated in its fate.

From this statement of facts, the question arises, whether the owners of this property are entitled to remuneration? It will be necessary, in order to obviate the difficulties raised by the Committee of Claims, to examine the principles on which their report is predicated. An objection is made, because the service with this property was rendered voluntarily. In this I had supposed a strong reason would have been found for an ample and speedy remuneration. When a call is made for the personal services of our countrymen, and when those services are rendered voluntarily, they are deemed more honorable than services rendered by compulsion. No sight is more pleasing than to see the citizens of our country, when public emergencies require, rally around the national standard. This principle ought to be cherished—it is the love of country—one of the most noble principles that is found in the American bosom. For my own part, I can discover no essential difference between a service rendered in the ranks, and a service rendered with property; the latter is as necessary as the former—without it no valuable object could be accomplished. Sir, this disposition, I am proud to acknowledge, has prevailed in the State of Ohio. Such was the anxiety for the promotion of the public service, and so willing were the citizens generally to contribute to the attainment of this object, that the citizen who was not willing to relinquish any species of property, however inconvenient to himself, for the public good, was marked as acting a dishonorable part. Had it not been for this disposition, the first Northwestern army could not have marched. The necessary supplies were furnished by the vigorous exertions of the patriotic citizens of the State. Money for the payment of the troops in a considerable degree was furnished from the same source. One banking institution, in the town of Cincinnati, advanced for the benefit of the army more than $500,000 in actual cash. This was a voluntary act, without any particular pledge on the part of the Government. Because it was a voluntary act, does it manifest a less degree of patriotism in the members of that institution, or are they the less entitled, if they have not received it, to a speedy remuneration?

The Committee of Claims, for the purpose of elucidating the principle governing their decision, have supposed the case to have existed between private individuals—where, the property being hired on a hazardous enterprise, equally known to both parties, the loss without the negligence of the hirer, sustained by the owner, it is not difficult to raise a presumption and on supposed premises give a correct decision. But it is often difficult to suppose a case precisely similar in all its parts to the one intended. I am willing to suppose the case under consideration to have existed between citizens in private life, and have no hesitation in giving it as my opinion, a recovery could be obtained in a court of justice. Add to these circumstances of the contract that the owners of this property were informed, unless they rendered a voluntary service, compulsive means would be resorted to, and taking the nature of the contract into view, surely no one can be found who will hesitate on the subject. But it is insinuated in the report, that the officers of the army had no power to give assurance of indemnification, and that nothing can be claimed by virtue of them. Sir, I am not satisfied with the correctness of this principle. What is the nature of impressment? Does it give any additional security to the rights of the citizen? Is it not intended entirely for the benefit of Government? Giving power to its agents to seize the property of the citizen when the public exigencies require—putting it out of the power of the citizen by a refusal to defeat the public service. But, because in extreme cases this power is given to your commanding officers, does it necessarily follow that they are not authorized to make other contracts obligatory on the Government? Are not your officers in fact authorized to make absolute purchases of such species of property as the service may require? If they are authorized to make an absolute purchase, may they not make a conditional one—more to the advantage of Government—a purchase to become absolute in case the property should be lost? Sir, in giving these assurances the officers of the army did not rest their opinion on mere conjecture. Property destroyed by the enemy at the battle of Tippecanoe had been paid for by the Government. This precedent was fresh in their recollection—add to this, every other case of a similar nature since the institution of the Government, and no one can longer doubt, that the officers of the Northwestern army were authorized to give the assurances they did. The Government had become pledged by its solemn acts, from which in similar cases it cannot recede without manifest injustice. Advert to the transactions at the Rapids of the Miami; additional assurances are there given. The owners of the property, not having calculated on their services being required farther, were reluctant to proceed—they were commanded to progress with the army; they had no direction over their property, it was completely under the control of the commanding General—they were compelled to obey.

Pursue the reasoning of the committee—suppose the case to have existed between private individuals—I would ask if the property had become lost through the negligence or improper conduct of the hirer, whether he would not be accountable to the owner? I am aware that I may here be met with a general presumption, that every officer is presumed to have done his duty, until he be regularly convicted. But, sir, in this instance, the act is too glaring to admit of such a presumption—from the highest officer next to the Commander-in-Chief, down to the private in the ranks, but one opinion exists, and that is, that the surrender of Detroit was unnecessary. All who witnessed the disgraceful scene bear testimony to the fact, and all who learn a correct relation of the circumstances, concur in the same opinion. By this act, the property of these citizens passed into the possession of the enemy. And are they to be refused a compensation? They have appealed to their country—shall they meet with a denial? Every principle of justice favors their claim, and demands a speedy indemnification. Would it be just to compensate the citizen whose property had been forced from his possession, by the hand of authority, for the public service, and turn him empty away, who indulged in his patriotic disposition by a voluntary tender of his property? Will not such a decision damp the feelings of our countrymen? Will it not alienate their affections from their country? No longer can they feel anxious to promote its service.

The Committee of Claims have assimilated the case under consideration to all cases of depredation, on sea as well as on land, committed by the enemy upon property not engaged in the public service. In my opinion, the most remote analogy does not exist. In the latter case, the Government has no agency in controlling the property; they do not impel the citizen the road to ruin! He engages in enterprises at discretion—he acts voluntarily—if he sustain a loss, his censure cannot justly fall on the Government, much less has he a right to claim from it indemnification. Such losses are so dissimilar in point of principle to the losses at Detroit, that they do not merit further examination.

Would it be politic to reject the present claims? The Government may refuse, but such refusal will not convince the claimants that their claims are not just. By a rejection, we give a deadly blow to those patriotic exertions which have characterized our citizens. We convince them, in the most forcible manner, that their country is ungrateful and unjust. They will discover that ruin is the only reward for their patriotism, and want to their families for having served their country. I trust such complaints may be avoided by an act of justice on the part of Government.

The question was then taken to concur with the Committee of the Whole in their disagreement to the said report, and passed in the affirmative.

A motion was then made, by Mr. ARCHER, to amend the said bill, by striking out, from the word "persons," in the third line of the first section, to the end of the section, and to insert the following: "whose wagon and team, sleigh, or boat, shall have been impressed into the public service, or forcibly detained in said service after having voluntarily entered it, since the commencement of the present war, or whose wagon and team, sleigh, or boat, shall be impressed into the public service, or shall be forcibly detained after having voluntarily entered it into said service, during the continuance of the said war: Provided, Such wagon and team, sleigh, or boat, shall be lost or destroyed in the public service, or shall be captured by the enemy."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative, and the bill was then read the third time, and passed.

The House spent some time in Committee of the Whole on the bill from the Senate to amend the militia laws, &c., and the Committee having risen and reported progress, leave was refused them to sit again.

A motion was made by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH to recommit said bill to a Committee of the Whole; but before the question was decided, the House adjourned.

MONDAY, August 2.

A quorum not being present, a motion was made by Mr. GROSVENOR that the House do now adjourn, and the question being taken, it was unanimously determined in the negative, ninety-six members being present, all of whom voted in the negative.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate, having completed the Legislative business before them, are now ready to adjourn; and they have appointed a committee on their part to wait on the President of the United States, and to inquire of him whether he has any further communications to make to Congress at the present session.

Mr. DAWSON and Mr. GROSVENOR were appointed of the abovementioned joint committee, on the part of the House.

Soon after, Mr. DAWSON reported that the committee had performed that service, and that the President answered that he had no further communications to make.

Ordered, That a message be sent to the Senate to inform them that this House is now ready to adjourn, and that the Clerk do go with the said message.

The Clerk accordingly went with the said message; and, having returned, the Speaker adjourned the House until the first Monday in December next.

SUPPLEMENTAL JOURNAL

Of such proceedings of the First Session of the Thirteenth Congress, as, during the time they were depending, were ordered to be kept secret, and respecting which the injunction of secrecy was afterwards taken off by order of the House.

THURSDAY, July 15, 1813.

The following preamble and resolution was submitted by Mr. STUART for consideration:

Whereas the Seat of the General Government, from the unprepared and defenceless state of the District of Columbia, is in imminent danger, if an attack should be made thereon: And whereas the fleet of the enemy is understood to be within a few hours' sail of the Capitol: And whereas the immense value of public property exposed to destruction, the great value of the public records, and other deeply interesting considerations, render it peculiarly important that any invasion of the Metropolis should be met with vigor and successfully repelled: Whereupon,

Resolved, That, in the opinion of this House, a distribution of such arms as are in the possession of the Government, within the District of Columbia, should be immediately made, to be placed in the hands of all able-bodied men within the District, willing to be embodied to perform military duty; and also in the hands of such members of this House as may be willing to receive them, to act against the enemy in any manner not incompatible with their public duties.

A question was taken, whether the subject-matter of the said proposition requires secrecy in discussion, and passed in the affirmative.

A motion was then made, by Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, that the said proposition do lie on the table. And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative—yeas 64, nays 74, as follows:

FRIDAY, July 16.

Mr. TROUP, from the Committee on Military Affairs, made the following report:

"The Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution of yesterday, having relation to the present movements of the enemy, report:

"That they have examined into the state of preparation, naval and military, made to receive the enemy, and are satisfied that the preparation is, in every respect, adequate to the emergency, and that no measures are necessary, on the part of the House, to make it more complete."

Which was read, and ordered to be inserted in the Journal.

Ordered, That the said report do lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. BIBB, the injunction of secrecy, imposed on the confidential proceedings of this House, of yesterday and to-day, was removed.

TUESDAY, July 20.

A Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read, and is as follows:

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

There being sufficient ground to infer, that it is the purpose of the enemy to combine, with the blockade of our ports, special licenses to neutral vessels, or to British vessels in neutral disguises, whereby they may draw from our country the precise kind and quantity of exports essential to their wants, whilst its general commerce remains obstructed; keeping in view, also, the insidious discrimination between different ports of the United States; and as such a system, if not counteracted, will have the effect of diminishing, very materially, the pressure of the war on the enemy, and encouraging a perseverance in it, at the same time that it will leave the general commerce of the United States under all the pressure the enemy can impose, thus subjecting the whole to British regulation, in subserviency to British monopoly: I recommend to the consideration of Congress, the expediency of an immediate and effectual prohibition of exports, limited to a convenient day in their next session, and removable, in the meantime, in the event of a cessation of the blockade of our ports.

JAMES MADISON.

WASHINGTON, July 20, 1813.

A question was taken whether the subject-matter of the said Message required secrecy; and passed in the affirmative.

Ordered, That the said Message be referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

WEDNESDAY, July 21.

Mr. CALHOUN, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the Message of the President of the United States, received yesterday, made a report; which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said report; and, after some time spent therein, the Speaker resumed the Chair, and Mr. KENNEDY reported that the Committee had had the said report under consideration, and agreed to the same, with an amendment; which was read at the Clerk's table, and concurred in by the House.

The said report, as amended, is as follows:

"Resolved, That it would be expedient to adopt the measures submitted by the Message to the consideration of the House."

A long debate took place on the adoption of this amendment. Mr. CLAY, and Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, spoke in favor of the amendment, and the policy of the measure. Mr. CALHOUN spoke in defence of the report of the Committee, and in opposition to an embargo; as did, also, Mr. DUVAL, of Kentucky, Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, Mr. HANSON, Mr. GROSVENOR, and others.

The question was then taken, to concur in the said report as amended, and passed in the affirmative—yeas 78, nays 51, as follows:

THURSDAY, July 22.

Mr. GRUNDY, from the committee appointed yesterday, reported a bill laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States; which was twice read and committed to a Committee of the Whole House to-day.

The question was taken; Shall the bill be the order of the day to-morrow? and was determined in the negative—yeas 56, nays 79, as follows:

The said bill was then made the order for this day.

And the House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill; and, after some time spent therein, Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair, and Mr. NELSON reported that the Committee had had the bill under consideration, and made several amendments thereto; which he delivered in at the Clerk's table, where they were again read, and concurred in by the House.

A motion was made by Mr. WRIGHT, further to amend the said bill, by striking out from the eleventh section, the words, "unless such captures shall be expressly proved to have been hostile."

And the question being taken, it was determined in the negative.

A motion was made by Mr. PITKIN, to amend the said bill, by striking out from the twelfth section, the words, "or in any manner apparently on their way towards the territories of a foreign nation, or the vicinity thereof, or towards a place where such articles are intended to be exported."

THURSDAY, July 29.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. CAMPBELL and Mr. VARNUM, their committee:

Mr. Speaker: The Senate do not concur in the bill passed by the House of Representatives, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States."

A motion was made by Mr. WRIGHT, that the injunction of secrecy imposed upon the proceedings of this House on the Message of the President of the United States of the 20th instant, be removed.

And the question being taken thereon, it passed in the affirmative.

SUPPLEMENTAL SPEECH.

SPEECH OF WILLIAM HUNTER,

OF RHODE ISLAND,

In secret session of the Senate of the United States, February 2d, 1813, on the proposition for seizing and occupying the Province of East Florida by the troops of the United States.

MR. HUNTER rose, and addressed the Chair as follows—

MR. PRESIDENT: It is, sir, with the utmost reluctance that I make the attempt to suggest some remarks on the present subject. For, although the question now under consideration is confessed on all sides to be one of the deepest interest and importance, involving in its decision no less a consequence than that of a change of our relations with a friendly Power, from a state of peace to that of war, yet we have been informed by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, (whose judgment on all occasions, from his experience and standing here, is entitled to peculiar respect,) that every exertion will be unavailing, and that it is the pre-determination of a majority of this Senate to adopt the present bill. If that gentleman desponds, after his own able and ample discussion of the present bill, and his own vigorous efforts to prevent his own prediction, it would be presumption in me to hope. Whoever, too, moves in the discussion of this question, must go on depressed, if not alarmed, by the denunciation of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, who, in the overflowing of an allowable zeal and anxiety, (connected, as he deems the success of this bill to be, with the peculiar interest and advantage of his own State,) has declared it not less than insatiation, that pretends to foresee any evil consequences resulting from its adoption.

In spite, however, of the forlorn hope to which I am condemned by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, and the certainty of incurring the penalty of the denunciation of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, (to whose personal good opinion I am far from being indifferent,) I feel myself impelled by obligations of duty, by a fair interpretation of the instructions of my constituents in reference to another occasion, and the clearest convictions of my understanding, to record my vote against the present proposition; and, from the pressure of the same motives, I find myself induced, hopeless and unpropitious as is the occasion, to assign my reasons for that vote.

And in the first place, is it nothing, is it a consideration worthy of no regard, that this House has but lately, after a protracted and solemn discussion, rejected the very proposition contained in the bill before us? Is a character for consistency in its measures of no importance to this branch of the Legislature? Does not the peculiarity of its construction—the duration of its members in office, and the very mode of their appointment, indicate the hope that it would be, and the design that it ought to be, distinguished for the consistency of its conduct? Do not all the speculations upon the theoretic perfection of our Constitution contemplate this, as the body that, resisting temporary impulses, and opposing its own firmness to a fluctuating and imbecile policy, would give something like system and stability to our national councils?

Sir, I doubt not our power at all times, and upon great and extraordinary occasions I doubt not the right, the expediency, and propriety of reversing our decisions. No body of men can be infallible, and therefore its decisions ought not to be irreversible. All I contend for is, that a case clear and strong indeed ought to be made out, to induce the Senate to forfeit, or even to hazard its character for stability and consistency. I do not say that our deliberate decision, a few months since, is such conclusive proof of its absolute perfection, of its entire impeccability, as that it operates as an estoppel upon all subsequent inquiry, and necessarily precludes all debate; but grounding myself upon a well-known distinction, I do say, it is most persuasive, convincing, and satisfactory evidence of the correctness of that decision, and that, according to all the principles of parliamentary usage, deducible either from the rules of a sound logic, or from judicial analogies, it imposes on the honorable mover of this proposition, and all its advocates, the necessity of substantiating, by new and further evidence, by arguments not before adduced, and by considerations of policy arising out of a new juncture of our affairs—the wisdom, propriety, and necessity of the present proceeding.

This too, sir, ought to be done with a clearness and copiousness of truth sufficient to repel the unwarrantable and inevitable suspicion which always attaches to a renewed effort for a rejected measure; to an application for a new trial, upon a suggestion of new and further evidence. What is the actual case? Have we new proof; even new statements? Have we had anything but arguments before refuted? Is the relation of our country different? Has any new event taken place? No, sir, it is not even pretended. I do, therefore, on the ground of our former decision, on the ground that we were then right, and on the absence of all new inducement from proof, statement, or argument, to do away that presumption, call upon gentlemen, as they respect themselves individually—upon the Senate, whose character for consistency and dignity (most important and essential attributes of that character) will be compromitted and hazarded with the Nation, to resist this overthrow of their best resolves—to stand to their former opinions, and to permit no contradictory record to be produced against them, to the degradation of their established political character and consequence.

Sir, on this point of consistency and adherence to our former resolves we ought to be the more tenacious, because we have excited hopes and expectations among our constituents, and especially the commercial class, that we ought not to disappoint. Next to an English, a Spanish war is the most disastrous, in which this country can be engaged. It affects, most deeply, the little commercial enterprise that is suffered to exist in the country. Upon the suggestion that you were playing at this deep game last session, a hundred commercial enterprises, connected with shipments to Spanish countries and colonies, were suspended. Upon your wise and virtuous rejection of this measure, hundreds of shipments, of enterprises grounded on your consistency, upon your permanency of system, have commenced, and are now proceeding.

Sir, it will be a gross breach of faith towards the commercial world—they will be ruined by this secret declaration of war. It will burst upon them, from this conclave, like a hurricane from the cave of Æolus, sweeping into the power of your enemy as large an amount of property as that for which we pretend we are solicitous to seek indemnification. Where is our property—our commerce? At Cadiz, at Havana, at Lisbon. Do you suppose that the Spaniards, and the Portuguese, their allies, are dullards and fools, and that they will omit the fair and honest exercise of the rights of reprisal and retaliation? Will they not preach our doctrines against ourselves—practice our own arts, and repel aggression by aggression?

It is not on the mere ground of obstinate, unenlightened, indiscriminating adherence to your former measures, that I appeal to your sense of honor, magnanimity, and consistency; but in relation to the prospect of loss—of disastrous consequences—of wide spread distress. The merchants are now pursuing a lucrative honest trade with a friendly nation, upon the ground of their special and unsuspecting confidence in this Senate. Will you disappoint that confidence, and expose them to inevitable ruin—yourselves to inevitable censure?

Sir, why should we, as a Senate, at this time introduce this proposition? Is it by way of penitence for our former sin—a means of obtaining pardon for our past offences—a reparation for wrongs we have done? Or is it that some terrible necessity exists, that the Senate should entitle itself to forgiveness, and propitiate selfish and senseless clamor by an act of submission and a surrender of its former opinions? Sir, I know we have the right to originate this measure; but is it proper, expedient, decorous, in us to do it? It was, at first, the measure of the House of Representatives; let them at least reproduce it. Why this attempt to oblige us to adopt a bantling they have abandoned? Why court a perilous responsibility, which it seems they have no longer the fortitude to encounter? At second hand, with our intermediate decision to break off the storm of public censure, they may be willing to adopt it; but let us leave to them the honor and the peril of this at least contingent measure. If it will be so productive of good, as some gentlemen predict, it will be an act of condescension and liberality for us to relinquish our pretensions in their favor; but if it be an act pregnant with innumerable evils, let the responsibility rest upon the broad shoulders of the immediate Representatives of the people. They have a power to which we cannot pretend; that of originating money bills—of devising the system of taxation. The present war has exceeded, in expense, all previous calculation; has transcended every estimate; and the expense of the next year will be at least double that of the last. A new war must inevitably lead to a farther enormous increase of the public burdens. Shall we originate measures, and leave to them the laborious, I am afraid odious, task of exacting from the pockets of the people the means of executing them? Or shall we heedlessly precipitate the country into a new war, ignorant whether the means will ever be provided to carry it on? Let us at least wait to see what is the system of taxation which their wisdom and patriotism will present to us. It may be too intolerable to be adopted; then this measure must fail, and we shall, as a Senate, have lavished our precious stock of public favor in a legislative effort at once premature and impotent.

Sir, I wish to husband our peculiar reputation. Prudence, caution, and circumspection, but, above all, independence; a firm, severe, and erect independence, ought to be the distinguishing qualities of this grave and dignified assembly. It is not for us to court popularity; but I am not unwilling to augment and corroborate our claims upon the public gratitude. We have already this session done much; we originated, and carried through, with uncommon despatch and unanimity, the bill for the augmentation of the Navy. We conducted, with like despatch and unanimity, our proceedings in regard to the merchants' bonds. We have unbound, from the rack, the victims of financial extortion, and preserved an useful and unoffending class of citizens from ruin, and the nation from disgrace. Let us not surrender these strong holds upon the public confidence. Let us at least not invoke public execration, by a rash declaration of an additional, unjust, and an unnecessary war. If the car of State is to be driven, Jehu-like, to destruction, let us refuse to be the charioteers.

I admit that these objections are entirely preliminary, and relate not so much to the specific merits of the question now under consideration, as to the point whether we ought to consider it at all. Whether (if I may so express myself) we ought to assume of it any cognizance whatever. But, in my humble conception, these objections are not less valid and important for being preliminary considerations, such as naturally and necessarily precede, and for a time exclude the discussion of the main question.

And, sir, there is another remaining topic under this head of argument, of more prevailing force than either of those I have attempted to illustrate.

Why, I ask, is there, in the mode of presenting this measure, a total evasion of Presidential authority? Is it a measure of the Cabinet? Then, why has it not the sanction of Presidential recommendation? Why are we to be used as a Constitutional screen, interposed between the people and the efficient initiator of this measure? Where is the Message, where is the manifesto, spreading out, in the expansion of detail, this declaration of another war, against an innocent, neutral, and friendly country? Is it not a Presidential measure? Then we are driving on to the consummation of a deed of dreadful import, without the usual and necessary instructions on this subject. It may be that we are doing something in opposition to another branch of the Government, who may hold, on this subject, opinions adverse to ours; and we are voluntarily subjecting ourselves to the peril of a dangerous conflict between the Constitutional authorities. This, I again admit, we have the power of doing; but is it right, proper, expedient, and decorous to do it? There may be an extreme case presumed, when it might be proper, at all hazards, to exercise this power; but will gentlemen pretend that the case has, in this case, occurred? Is this an occasion of such pressing emergency, of such imperious necessity, of such obvious enormity, as compels us from duty and principle to act, even at the hazard of interrupting the harmony of the different departments of the Government?

By the third section of the second article of the Constitution it is made the duty of the President, from time to time, to give to the Congress information of the state of the Union, and recommend to their consideration such measures as he shall judge necessary and expedient. It is his imperative duty—he shall do it. It is a fair presumption, that if he thought this measure advisable, just, honest, practicable, and expedient, that he would have recommended it.

I know, sir, that some gentlemen object to this course of observation, and alarm themselves with a jealousy that there is in this argument something that imports a surrender of the independent powers of this House, and they repel, with some warmth and indignation, the opinion that we should not act upon our own plans and conceptions without a previous Presidential recommendation. Most undoubtedly the gentleman from Pennsylvania is correct—I admit it—this is the theory of the Constitution, and there may be cases in which it would not only be the duty of this House to act without Presidential communication, but something like treason not to act. But is this such a case? This resort to the dormant, theoretical principles of the Constitution, in contradistinction to the daily, well-understood, and unobjectionable practice of every Administration—this assertion of a truism, which, in the abstract, nobody is disposed to deny; this stripping a case of all its circumstances, for the purpose of facilitating the progress of an unusual and unexplained course, is, I confess, not a mode of reasoning for which my plain and unscholastic mind has a preference. I admired the animation and the spirit with which the gentleman from Pennsylvania asserted his own personal independence in regard to the Executive, and feel grateful to him for the clear exposition of the principles upon which our independence as a political body is Constitutionally withheld; and I accord with him in the assertion, that initiative legislation in all cases, but those of revenue, and uninfluenced deliberation in all cases, without exception, is the right and privilege of this House.

But the exercise of this right, to be practically useful and beneficial, will, from its very nature, be infrequent. It is no corroboration of that right to assert it in unqualified terms, or to resort to it without judicious discrimination or self-evident necessity. And, sir, in a case involving a change of our relations, from a state of peace with a friendly nation to that of war, no instance can hardly be imagined, in which our primary interference would be justifiable. It was clearly shown by my honorable friend from Connecticut, with a peculiar felicity of illustration, and an irrefutable force of argument, to be in as little accordance with the spirit of the Constitution as it is contrary to the uniform practice under it. It may be, sir, reprobated as a Tory doctrine, but I have imbibed it, from an attention to the cases that have occurred under the Administration of Messrs. Jefferson and Madison. In the great cases of the two embargoes, in that of the war with England, in this very measure heretofore, and, indeed, in all where a change of our relative situation with foreign Powers was contemplated, we have had an Executive Message—a distinct recommendation. And, sir, this is the true Whig doctrine; it is the correct Republican course; it fixes the responsibility upon one person; it limits—it defines it—it reduces it to a single point. We can judge of the recommendation, by the reasons by which it is enforced; we can venture to indulge in a warrantable confidence, as to the truth of the statements that are made, because we know they are made under the consciousness and the peril of the highest official responsibility. If the measure recommended, and made the basis of our proceedings, should afterwards appear to have proceeded from base, corrupt, or traitorous motives, by the Constitutional process of impeachment the transgression would be visited on the actual transgressor, the national honor would be redeemed, and the public justice would be vindicated.

But, in the present mode, who is responsible—who, in any event, would be impeachable? To the President, solely, in the first instance, is intrusted the treaty-making power. He watches over our concerns with foreign nations: he has the means of intelligence—the power of interference. If the former relative situation of our affairs with Spain has changed, he ought and will, unless you presume him criminally indifferent to his sacred duty and his country's welfare, announce that change. Shall we clamorously rush to arms, when the sentinel on the watch-tower has lighted no beacon—has sounded no trumpet—has rung no alarm-bell?

How do we know that the functions of the treaty-making power in this instance have ceased; that the virtuous attempt to preserve the country in peace has been abandoned in despair? May we not heedlessly and officiously interfere with unclosed negotiations on this very subject, and thus disappoint the best concerted efforts of the proper authority directed to the attainment of this very object, by peaceful in preference to belligerent means? Was not this the very argument urged successfully the last session in relation to France?

Were not the manifold and enormous injuries committed against us by France equally reprobated by all parties, and did we not all agree that reparation—prompt, comprehensive, effectual reparation—was due? What restrained us from requiring it in the same way from France, as we did from England? Because the President announced to us that negotiations with the one Power, and not with the other, were closed. Let us wait for the same communication in regard to Spain.

These considerations, drawn from the nature of the treaty-making power, when first urged by my honorable friend from Connecticut, seemed, by the admission of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky on my right, to have made their proper impression on his candid and intelligent mind. But, he has struggled manfully against his tendency to be convinced against his will, and has reconciled himself (as we all too easily can) to a former favorite prepossession. But, the course of reasoning by which the honorable gentleman achieved this victory over himself, is to my humble conception as fallacious in principle as it has been, when acted on by ministers and politicians, baneful in its effects. It is grounded on the assumption of the fact, that there is no existing authority in Spain, with whom it is safe and proper to treat. This, too, is the favorite argument of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, who last addressed you. The stress and substance of his very able address appeared to me to be this: You must do this act; necessity constrains you to adopt it, as a measure of security and precaution. You cannot negotiate; there is no Spain with whom to treat; or at any rate there is no Spain, but as identified with Great Britain.

In the true republican language of old times, I should say, that is the Government which the people will to be so; and I should take the evidence of that will, not from an English newspaper—Cobbett's Register, which was quoted by the honorable gentleman from Georgia—but from their formal public acts. I agree the hereditary King was Charles; the rightful King is Ferdinand; the intrusive, usurping King is Joseph. The country is invaded by France, and is closely allied with England; but still, in principle and fact, and for all efficient purposes, the Government is Spanish —legitimately Spanish—represented and conducted by the agents of the Spanish nation; who make treaties, contract alliances, fight battles, achieve victories, and perform all the essential duties and mighty functions of a great nation. We have, at this very moment, a Minister from that nation resident in this country—why he has not been publicly acknowledged, it is not for me to say—who has tendered reparation for all the wrongs Spain has at any time inflicted on this country;—on her part, unintentional wrongs, occasioned by the peculiarity of her situation, and inflicted, not from injustice, but in consequence of French instigation, and French despotic dictation. The whole of our unpublished correspondence with Spain, proves that she acted under duress. These wrongs, sir, were accidental blows, which, in the paroxysm of distress, she directed without aim against a friend; and for which, now restored to sanity and freedom, she feels penitence, and offers reparation. It would be unjust to avenge ourselves in her present distresses; ungenerous, because her house is on fire, to plunder it of its precious effects; unchristian, not to meet penitence with forgiveness.

According, sir, to our American principles, grounding ourselves on the acknowledged rules of public law, there always is a legitimate Government de facto: we interfere not with the independence or interior constitutions of foreign nations. I admit that there may exist circumstances to which this, as a general rule, must bend; but it is a fact, that has been repeatedly stated in print, and never contradicted, and, to the conviction of my mind, ascertained by circumstances, that the reparation offered by the Minister of the Cortes of Spain was an immediate reparation—a reparation in rem—by the delivery of dollars actually in this country to the amount of all our fair claims; the amount to be settled by Commissioners, upon the principle of the very convention made by Mr. Charles Pinckney, once acquiesced in by this very Senate, and highly advantageous to this country. If we get the reparation by honest means; if we were snug in our indemnity by consent of parties; we clearly should have an equitable, and in all events a legal right, to retain it, let what would happen. No matter who might hereafter occupy the Government of Spain, no action for money had and received could be rightfully instituted against us, and, if attempted to be exacted by force, we should then clearly have a right to repel force by force. We ought to have disdained the menaces of an interfering, usurping Power—have consulted solely American interests and feelings—have taken the money and paid it over to the suffering merchants, to whom it belonged.

It strikes me as something strange, indeed, that gentlemen should assert that Spain has no Government, and yet in the same breath assert that she is in strict alliance with Great Britain. Is she incapable of maintaining the relations of peace and amity, and yet in strict alliance with another nation? Has she not lately, likewise, formed a treaty with Russia, who has acknowledged her independence? Has she not lately issued a declaration of neutrality, in regard to this country and our present war? If Spain has no Government, she has no colonies—no jurisdiction over them; they are separated from the mother or metropolitan country; they become, as to her, foreign, independent countries; as such, their rights ought to be by us respected. We have no right to avenge ourselves for Spanish wrongs on countries not Spanish.

Sir, the experience of all ages proves that it is idle to debate upon the theories of a Constitution, in relation to the observance of treaties. If a fair and rational treaty be made, so that it is the mutual interest of parties to observe it, you have obtained the true security, and only wise dependence for the continuance of peace. Treaties made by a Government, when under one form of internal constitution, are still binding, though that form may be changed. We have acted on and recognised this principle. Do we know of any King of Spain but Ferdinand? It is admitted he has been announced to us. Has the pretended claim of Joseph Bonaparte to the Crown of Spain, its territories and colonies, ever been made known in a formal and official manner to this Government? Have we ever acknowledged it? Have we had any legal, or even constructive notice of his arrogant pretensions? If so, where is the correspondence? Who is his Minister? Do we mean to take possession of this country, under color of that title? Have we bargained, in the Treaty of Limits negotiated by Mr. Barlow, for the cession of this country to us? What was the consideration of that bargain—what were its terms? Is it indeed true, that the offered compensation for the robberies committed on us by France, is to be an issue of a batch of licenses and a cession of East Florida? A reparation of ill faith, by permitting us again to be exposed to its treachery; a restitution for plunder, by authorizing us to plunder!

On a former occasion, when we were about to take a Territory, confessedly ours by treaty and purchase, we were told by France to stay our hand; did we not obey her? Was not, even at that time, the magnanimity (as it was called) of France a theme of eulogy in this country? Was not the answer of Talleyrand to our Minister—I think Mr. Livingston—a plain and (if the phrase can be applied to him) an honest one? If you go to war with Spain, France will take the part of Spain. And did we not in consequence desist? You either have or have not got the assent of France to this seizure. If you have got it, it is by private, covert negotiation—a mean acceptance of illegal plunder from a Power, whose ten thousand wrongs, injuries, and insults, are unredressed, uncompensated, unrevenged.

If we have not got her assent, we act inconsistently, and encounter the very danger—that of a contested title—which we affect to be solicitous to avoid; and in case (which, God forbid!) France should be victorious in her attempt to overthrow the liberties of mankind, we should have to restore it at her bidding. She will convert us into a mere trustee of her own appointment, for her own benefit. She will have a cession from Spain, previous to our conquest.

Everything in relation to the claim or right of France seems to be evaded—but gently touched, hinted at, with the utmost delicacy and caution—traced, as it were, in doubtful characters, in chemical ink, which the heat of some future occasion is to bring out. We know our Spanish concerns are closely linked with our French concerns; but how, to what extent, we are not permitted to know. We are too scrupulous to treat with Spain as the ally of England, because we deem it beneath our dignity to treat otherwise than with an independent and co-equal Power. Yet, is it not true, that when Spain was in a state of vassalage to France, this was deemed no objection to frequent negotiations? We asserted her nominal independence, and treated with the vassal by permission of the lord, and for his benefit.

Does the gentleman mean to say, we ought to take possession of St. Augustine, because the Spanish local authorities are opposed by conspirators, traitors to their own country—no, they have no country—by renegadoes—a banditti; or, (to state this in terms as little offensive as possible to the feelings of gentlemen,) because there is a Jacobin, revolutionary movement in that country? Does a really deep, honest, spontaneous, revolutionary movement exist there? Is it not, on the contrary, an artificial, concerted, contrived, petty, patched-up, miserable treason, paid for by our money, fomented by our people? Who caused that movement? Was it not solely occasioned by American interference—by American instigation? When the names were read, from Matthews's communication and the other papers, could the gravest among us forbear to smile at the paucity of Spanish names among the conspirators? There was here and there a Don Juan, and a Don Gomez, in a long list of well-known American names and characters.

I ask gentlemen, did we find a revolution there, or did we create it? And shall we, in violation of the principle which protects us and every civilized society, from hateful, corrupt, foreign interference, in shameful inconsistency with all we said and did in Henry's affair, take advantage of our own wrong, and, with an hypocrisy unrivalled but by Bonaparte himself, practice the very arts against an innocent, unoffending people, against which we were justly indignant, when we had even a distant suspicion that they might be used against our honor, our integrity, our independence? But, sir, I will not further, at present, pursue this topic. My object is not to excite adverse feeling, but merely to awaken a strict attention, and direct a temperate investigation to the proposition before us. What is that proposition; what is the statement of the case, as presented us by the honorable Chairman of the committee? It is to seize a province belonging to Spain; to seize and occupy it by the armies of the United States; to besiege an important and formidable fortress; to use force against a present friendly, neutral Power—that is, in short, to wage war against Spain. What are the avowed reasons, or rather pretexts?—I say pretexts, because it is historically and proverbially true, that those who are determined on war—who are greedy for conquest—can always find pretexts, and dignify them with the name of reasons. War, indeed, is the ultima ratio regum; and when we read the manifestoes of Kings determined to make war, it is more that literary curiosity may be gratified, than that our consciences may be enlightened, or our understandings convinced. We may occasionally be delighted with the speciousness of statement and dexterity of argument; we may be momentarily dazzled with the splendid colors with which ingenuity may deck the robe of fraud, but the inherent deformity of the design it is impossible to conceal.

Imbecile, indeed, must be the understanding—disingenuous, indeed, the nature—of that man, who does not instantly detect and despise the miserable, though elaborate sophistry, which justifies invasion, and instigates to plunder, and (in wretched inconsistency) seeks a confirmation of independence and a guarantee of the integrity of empire in the subjugation of an innocent neighbor, and in propagating, as the precursor of arms, the holy doctrines of insurrection, treason, and rebellion. I own that I rejoice that so much pains have been taken to apologize for this measure. It shows that we still retain some sense of shame—that we do not surrender our innocence without some decent struggles to save appearances. We have not, as yet, acquired the unblushing hardihood of our great prototypes and models. Though unjust in our design, we pay some homage to justice; we dare not openly despise what mankind have hitherto deemed most sacred; we acknowledge that flagrant injustice ought to arouse indignation. The invasions that have been carried on by other nations—the different partitions of Poland—the capture of the Danish fleet—we agree were atrocious acts. But, our occupation of East Florida, partly by force of arms, and partly by subornation of treason, is a different affair; our pretext is indemnity. It has long ago been elegantly said, that when a lamb is to be devoted, any thicket in which it may happen to stray will furnish the fuel necessary for its sacrifice.

But, sir, I recollect there is an argument which has been distinctly announced, and was strenuously urged by the honorable gentleman from Tennessee on my right, which is worthy of examination, though, I humbly conceive, susceptible of easy refutation. He denies this will be war. As this argument comes from so respectable a quarter, I will endeavor to obviate it, not by reasonings of my own, but by the most complimentary course I can adopt—by the quotation of respectable and conclusive authority. We will appeal to the writers on the laws of nations, and to Vattel, as the most authoritative and judicious of all those writers. [Here, Mr. HUNTER quoted Vattel.] Leaning then, sir, upon this staff of authority, I say this is not only war, but an offensive war; not only an offensive, but an unjust war; not only unjust, but I am, for the honor of my country, deeply apprehensive that, in the minds of foreign nations—in the minds of a majority of this nation, whose moral sense it will offend—it is liable to the odious epithet contained in the last sentence I have quoted: It is a wicked war; it is robbery!

If this is not war, but something done only in reference to and for the security of an indemnity; a reducing of a legal lien into possession; a process to confirm peace; an instrument of negotiation;—it is a measure the President already has in his power; it is the treaty-making power; he can act without our aid.

But, sir, can there be any doubt that this act will be war against Spain? If we reject Vattel's definition, shall we adopt that of Mr. Jefferson? Is it not an effort to do, in this instance, as much harm as we can? Is it not an attempt to reduce the people of East Florida to a foreign yoke? Are gentlemen discontented at the expression? Let them examine it; it is strictly correct. Their independence of us is to be presumed as valuable to them, as our independence of them is valuable to us. They have an equal right to self-government. Their peculiar habits, usages, and institutions, their very prejudices and errors, are as dear to them as ours are to us. Do we affect to pity them, and compassionate their real or imaginary sufferings, under what Mr. Monroe calls a tottering and irresolute Government? They deeply reciprocate your commiseration, and congratulate themselves that they are not as we are—Protestants, republicans, and sinners.

Shall we adopt Mr. Madison's definition of war? He describes—and a majority here must say, justly describes—impression as an assumption of self-redress; a substitution of force, which falls within the definition of war. Do we pretend that we can invest fortresses, circumvallate cities, raise fleets and armies, and move them against a foreign nation; have all the pride, pomp, and circumstance of war, and yet prevent this from being war, by asseverating it is not war?

Sir, I cannot for a moment hesitate to believe it will be war in fact. So deemed by Spain and her allies; so deemed by the people of the United States. It is at least the contemplated, apprehended, inevitable consequence of our act. Why not then declare it directly, unequivocally, and without evasion? The rule of common law is, in this respect, the rule of common sense, and of universal equity. What you ought not to do directly, you ought not to do indirectly. Intending war—at least, calculating that the inevitable consequence of your proceedings will be war, why do we not frankly, manfully, magnanimously declare it? Let the people of this country understand it; let us have an open war for an avowed object. Why should we shroud our intention in dastardly ambiguity? This evasive course—this doing a thing per obliquum, per fraudum—is what our Constitution, springing as it does from our republican habits, from our inborn love of justice, from our moral aversion to conquest, and our physical inaptitude for it; from our love of peace, from our well founded apprehensions that our extent of territory is already dangerously excessive; this evasive course—this obliquity of conduct—is what our Constitution, influenced by these considerations, prohibits, deprecates, and disdains.

Though I am afraid, sir, this argument, in reference to the constitutionality of our course, according to the fashion of the day, will be deemed a point of little consequence; yet, sir, I deem it proper to suggest and enforce it. By our Constitution, there can be no merely constructive declaration of an offensive war; it must be a direct one. As a Legislature, we have the power, not of making war, but of declaring war. Congress shall have power "to declare war." This clause, so worded, must evidently settle the old litigated question raised by many writers on the laws of nations, viz: whether a declaration should not always precede an offensive war? We are to declare it, to announce it in plain terms to our people, and to the enemy. It is intended we should refer them to a plain declaration of the change of our condition—not draw them into it by an act circuitously leading to this result, and involving this as an inevitable consequence.

In interpreting our Constitution, when it refers to the topics treated of, and the terms used in the law of nations, our construction ought to be in conformity to the law of nations; as much as when it adopts the principles and terms of the common law, we must refer to them, by them elicit its meaning, and modify its construction. War has a technical meaning in the law of nations. To declare war, is a precise, technical, appropriate, unambiguous, undeceiving phrase. It is the peculiar idiom of a just and wise nation. The declaration with us must always precede the act; of course, I refer to offensive war. Defensive war explains and declares itself. The framers of our Constitution intended, that our offensive wars should be few, indeed; never, except in a case of terrible necessity. They intended they should be lawful wars, in due form—the justa bella of Grotius. There must be a denunciatio belli. This is one of the restraints imposed, and intended by the Constitution as a check against the sudden or frequent breaking out of this pestilence of the human race.

Sir, if you pass this law, to take possession of the colony of a foreign, friendly, European Power, you make no previous declaration of war. But, by the concession of all, it is war. It is absurd to say, you can shatter my arm, and cut off my limbs, and pretend it is not war upon my person. To say nothing of the unfairness and injustice of this course towards the foreign nation, who has thus no chance of making you voluntary reparation for real or imaginary wrong, what is your conduct towards your own citizens? What is their miserable, because uncertain, condition? Would it be treason to-morrow for American citizens to give information to the Government of St. Augustine, to supply their settlement with arms and provisions? Would it be treason to supply the European mother country with grain? Sir, there are no means of a nation carrying into effect an extra-territorial law, against a foreign resisting nation, but by force, but by war. Ought you not to apprise your own citizens? are they to be endangered and entrapped? If they can supply without treason, they certainly can without misdemeanor. For this act is included in the definition of treason, and all mere misdemeanors are merged. The people of St. Augustine become your enemies; can you carry them succor? Will you venture to indict for treason those who supply them? Or will you, most inconsistently and absurdly, permit your own citizens to counteract your purpose, and frustrate your object? Will you place yourselves in the undignified, embarrassing attitude, of seeing them violate your laws, and yet be dispensable?

Sir, there is something in this proceeding, at which the genius of our Constitution revolts; it violates all our fundamental maxims of internal intercourse and Constitutional construction; it inverts all our theories, it overthrows all our precedents.

What, sir, are the justificatory causes of this war, as understood by General Pinckney? Not that he approves them; he seems anxious to explain to the Government that he acts as a soldier in obedience to command; he accepts with reluctance his compound character, half military, half diplomatic, and industriously collects apologies for the act he is compelled to execute, from his correspondence with the Government. He enumerates six distinct grounds, on which he understands he is to justify his occupation of the Province of East Florida:

1. Indemnity for the spoliations committed by Spain.
2. Refusal to grant an amnesty to the Spanish revolutionary patriots.
3. The pretendedly illegal attack upon the troops at Moosa, during the negotiation.
4. Excitement of the Indians.
5. Seduction of negroes into the service of the Spaniards.
6. The apprehension of the use that may be made of the country, by our present enemy, Great Britain.

They may be all included in the convenient and comprehensive phrase of Mr. Pitt, the splendid apology of years of protracted war—indemnity for the past, security for the future; but, above all, satisfaction for our honor.

The first general ground, indemnity for the past, consists in an assertion that injuries have been committed against us by Spain, and that reparation has been, and is, refused. The second general ground resolves itself into necessity. This but too frequently is the tyrant's plea; but, in the present case, it is asserted to be an honest necessity, justifying, on military maxims, this measure, as the dictate of self-defence.

That Spain, unregenerated, unrevolutionized, ancient Spain, as the ally of France, and as instigated by France, committed unwarrantable spoliation on our commerce, is true; but that she has ever denied reparation and indemnity, I conceive that every step taken, in the various negotiations with her, will disprove. It can hardly be expected that I shall enter into a minute and elaborate discussion of these negotiations—the mere perusal of documents, published and unpublished, would occupy more of the precious time of the Senate than I feel myself authorized to consume. But, sir, I have felt it my incumbent duty to peruse these documents, to consider them with all the attention the importance of the subject demanded, and I have perused them with all the eagerness of curiosity, and that spirit of impartial inquiry, which a young and unhackneyed politician, who avows himself free from prejudices and prepossessions, in common liberality, I hope may be presumed to feel.

Sir, the honest and sincere conviction of my mind is, that Spain is not only guiltless of unwillingness of reparation, and of reluctance to indemnity, but that with such guilt our Government never charged her, until circumstances rendered it as difficult for Spain to consummate reparation, as it was unfair and improper for our Government to urge, or to expect it. A nation, as well as an individual, has claims upon our compassion and humanity.

Ungenerous, indeed, must be his nature, who would press even his legal claim, with the same stubborn and indiscriminate pertinacity, against an individual struggling with adversity, and oppressed by misfortunes, as against one who was thriving and prosperous, and who resisted justice from the pride of power, and the arrogance of wealth. But, sir, I will not rest this point upon an appeal to our generosity, estimable as that feeling is, and prevalent as it is in this nation and this Assembly. The facts, evidence, justice, bear me out in this assertion: that Spain has not refused, does not refuse compensation—a fair reparation for all losses sustained by individuals, in consequence of her own spoliation on our commerce.

By the Treaty of 1795, concluded by General Thomas Pinckney, our merchants received not only adequate indemnity, but even a lucrative compensation for their losses. In opening the negotiation of 1802, Mr. Charles Pinckney refers to this fact, and eulogizes, in a style of more than ordinary diplomatic courtesy, the integrity, the good faith, and the magnanimity of the Spanish Government. Spain had become strictly allied to France, and through the pusillanimity, perhaps corruption, of the favorite, the Prince of Peace, had also become meanly subordinate to her designs, a partaker in her crimes and follies, though not in her spoils. She was at once the dupe of her councils, and the prey of her rapacity. At the instigation of France, she depredated upon our commerce. She grounded her proceedings upon French decrees. But these were wrongs, as I have before said, unintentionally committed, and which she was solicitous to repair. But few difficulties, and no great delay, occurred in the settlement of the Convention of the 11th of August, 1802. The principal difficulty arose from the attempt, on the part of our negotiators, to have included in the treaty, compensation as well for Spanish wrongs as for those inflicted by France in Spanish territories. This was resisted; certainly with some show of reason and equity on the part of Spain. But Count Cevallos, the Spanish Minister, offered to include even these, in a certain way. That is, he was willing that the general question, how far Spain ought to be liable for French aggressions in her territories, on American property, should be left to the Commissioners, who were to be appointed, according to an article of the convention. He was willing to leave it on the grounds of equity and justice, and the circumstances of the case, for them to determine. A proposition, in a transaction of this nature, certainly importing uncommon fairness and integrity; especially when we consider that the Commissioners were to be mutually appointed. Mr. Pinckney, either from error of judgment or the strictness of his instructions, rejected this proposition, and insisted on and obtained an article holding in reserve and unextinguished our claims for French depredations, as matter for future negotiation. This convention, as has been explained by the honorable gentleman from Vermont, rested for a length of time, session after session, before the Senate. It was at length ultimately approved, and ratified here. Before, however, it was returned to Spain, the transfer of Louisiana by France to the United States took place—an event which was, as Mr. Jefferson informs us, as unexpected as disagreeable to Spain; an act which she bitterly regretted, against which she solemnly but unavailingly protested. But our convention with France, in respect to Louisiana, including as that did, a settlement of all our claims for all French spoliation and depredations, had now materially and rightfully changed our relative situation with Spain. She no longer assented to that clause of the treaty, which kept alive against her claims for French spoliation. As has been explained by the honorable gentleman from Vermont, she denied our right to a double satisfaction for the same injuries—a double payment of the same debt. She contended she was virtually released; and in this she was supported by the express declaration of France, and by the opinion of the most celebrated lawyers and civilians of this country, some of them officers of the Government.

But she never refused compensation for her own spoliation; fruitless negotiations on this and other topics still continued. And by the Message of Mr. Jefferson, in 1808, we are informed, that “the important negotiation with Spain, which had been alternately suspended and resumed, necessarily experiences a pause, under the extraordinary and interesting crisis which distinguishes her internal situation.”

That crisis has not yet subsided. This, sir, is a very concise, and I hope not uncandid history of our negotiation with Spain. I refer with confidence to the documents. They are in the hands of gentlemen who can detect any involuntary error. If I have committed one, I assure them it is involuntary. I said, sir, that the interesting and extraordinary crisis, to which Mr. Jefferson referred, as distinguishing the internal situation of Spain, had not subsided. What was that crisis? A mighty effort by the great mass of the people, abandoned by their King, deserted by their nobles, rising up in their might to expel a foreign invader and usurper from their dear native soil. Examine the history of all previous revolutions—that which expelled Austria from Switzerland, Spain from Holland, the Stuarts from England, and England from this country—and you will discover none of them to be the effect of a more genuine, deep-felt, popular emotion, than the revolution achieved by the patriots of Spain. Yes, sir, that people are engaged in a war of defence of their native soil, their firesides, their altars, against a foreign invader; in a war of that kind, that does and ought to excite the most sensitive interest, the most affectionate sympathy, in the bosoms of a free people, especially of a people themselves but recently independent, and who had to fight for their independence. Strange indeed it is, that the wars of Greece against Persia, should retain an unfading interest in our memories, and excite, even at this day, sublime and pious emotions; and that the wars of the Spanish patriots should be forgotten. Strange, indeed, that we remember Marathon, and forget Saragossa.

Sir, what was the first effect of this revolution in Spain in regard to this country?—a restoration, in mass, of all the vessels and property belonging to American citizens; an order to their Court of Prizes to act no more on the French decrees; an observance of all the articles of the treaty with us. This they did voluntarily, as an act of justice, and as a pledge of that good will towards us, which a newly emancipated people felt towards one happily already free and independent. What was the further effect, when the Government was in some degree settled, and had leisure to attend to its foreign concerns?—a mission to this country, in the person of Chevalier Onis. Why, sir, is there this dexterous evasion, this strenuous effort on the part of the Administration to keep from the sight of the people, from the sight of the Senate, a co-ordinate branch of the treaty-making power, the correspondence of Don Onis, or rather his attempts at correspondence? Why cannot this nation be authentically informed of the fact, whether he made a formal and express offer to place in the hands of our Government in advance, a sum in specie, sufficient to satisfy all the claims for captures, and for injuries sustained, through the withholding the permission of deposite at New Orleans; that he likewise offered to adjust the subject of the boundaries of Louisiana in a manner satisfactory to ourselves?—that he offered substantially to do all this, I am convinced. It has been published in Spain, under the eye of the Cortes; it has been published, over and over again, in this country. It has never been contradicted. It has been made the ground of Ministerial assertion in England, to evince the nature of French influence in the United States; it has been made the ground of reasoning, in the discussion of the French Moniteurs, to evince to the Spaniards how much safer they were under French protection than that of the patriots. France, say they, protected you against the arrogant and enormous claims of those trans-Atlantic, shopkeeping democrats. She gave you the means of restraining their rapacity, or participating in their ill-gotten profits. She was a guarantee to you against their ambitious intentions, hostile to your valuable but unprotected colonies. But your patriotic Government yields to these insolent demands, and seems to favor their projects. It offers them the treasures, of which you are in want; it opens the protective barriers of your colonies, and endangers the mines of Mexico—the source of your opulence, and the basis of your national grandeur.

Sir, we have served a notice on the President to produce the correspondence, to detail the verbal offers of Don Onis; not being produced, we have a right to state what we justly suppose to be their substance. Our divinations, conjectures, if they be conjectures, can be put down at once; falsified by the production of the papers, but by nothing else. This again, sir, is a rule of common law, and common sense. Circumstances, the absence of all contrary proof, the cautious forbearance of all denial, the non-production of papers, when called for by friends, the gratuitous assumption of limiting the intentions of the Senate, in their call for papers, to those which had occurred since the last session; all this tends convincingly to prove, that this offer of indemnity, on the part of the Spanish Government, has been made, and has been rejected.

How stands the case, then, on the foot of indemnity? Not a refusal on the part of Spain to make adequate and liberal indemnity, but a refusal on our part to accept it. Sir, the mass of papers produced, bulky as they are, is more remarkable for its deficiency, than its contents. There is something, not produced, which if it were produced, would be fatal, on the head of indemnity. There are various other topics of argument, which might be urged against this strong ground of pretended indemnity. If you are injured, and deem yourself entitled to indemnity, ought you not previously to demand it? Even the British demanded the Danish fleet, and it was refused, before they seized it. Has the honorable Chairman of the committee forgotten his own able and successful arguments, and those of his friends, on this point, in the Senate, on Mr. Ross's resolution in 1803? A positive injury was inflicted, a perfect and essential right secured and consecrated by treaty was denied you; but then, the honorable gentleman, with his usual ability, supported by his amiable friend De Witt Clinton, manfully, triumphantly stemmed the torrent of the redundant, I will not say overbearing, eloquence of Ross and Gouverneur Morris—explained to the nation the duty, the necessity, the justice of previous negotiation, and preserved this young and prosperous nation from a premature and unnecessary conflict.

Supplemental Speech.

What was correct, judicious, and moral then, I humbly apprehend will be so now.

But, sir, upon the mere principles of indemnity, conceding that you had a right to take it, it would not, in any sense of the term, be one. It is inadequate, if obtained, even if it cost nothing to obtain it. Waiving the consideration of the amount of spoliation, it will cost more to recover the thing sued for than it is worth. It is no indemnity to the actual sufferers by Spanish spoliation, and this act is accomplished by no pledge of the national faith, that they shall be individually compensated from this fund for their losses, while their losses are made the only ground or pretext of this proceeding. Even, sir, at the risk of being tedious and uninteresting, I must concisely examine each of these points. Will it be pretended that Florida is worth the whole claim of our Government against Spain? We must take gentlemen on their own principles, and calculate the amount set down by our Government, including Spanish spoliation—French spoliation in Spanish territories—and the injuries sustained by the prohibition of the right of deposit at New Orleans. The first item amounts to three, the second to two millions; the last may be stated at one, making six millions principal, with the interest for ten years, constituting an aggregate of about ten millions of dollars. And would you as a matter of purchase give a fourth of this sum for Florida, if you could have quiet possession of it to-morrow? No, sir, you would wisely hesitate; nay you would absolutely reject it. But if you carve out your own remedy; convert into possession and enjoyment your deposit—your pledge—consume your right of lien by ownership; select your means and chance of indemnity; estreat your bond with all its amount of penalties; you have all that in law, justice, or equity you can demand. The question is closed; you have no action open on your covenants or assumpsits. But, sir, to whom is Florida, with its wide waste of sands, its dismal swamps, its mixed, mongrel population, transferred? To the actual sufferers by Spanish and French spoliation? to the individual sufferers in the cities of Charleston, Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, Boston, Salem, Providence, and Newport? No, sir, it is transferred nominally to the United States, who takes it in her corporate capacity as trustee for the State of Georgia. She will have the greatest, if not the sole beneficiary interest; as for the claims of the merchants, they will still be uncompensated; Spain or France, or the United States, will still stand debited in their ledgers. Sir, I know a house in the town of Providence who are interested in this claim to the amount of $200,000. I know of another, in the city of New York, interested to double this amount, and whose right and chance of compensation, under the convention of August, 1802, were admitted and ascertained.

Sir, I would as soon shake at them the sand of an hourglass, as measure out to them the sands of Florida as a compensation, even if you meant to give them that which you do not intend. It would, indeed, be a memento mori of their claim. If this transaction is bottomed upon a pure and comprehensive equity, why is it not accompanied with a pledge of the faith of the United States to compensate the individual sufferers? Are they to be left to their legal remedies, against Sovereigns not suable? Is one part of the Union to convert to their own exclusive benefit the misfortunes of the other part? Are the planters of the South (against whom I certainly have no prejudices) to thrive and prosper upon the losses of the merchants of the North? Are they, who have paid no consideration, to hold and enjoy this estate? I put this plain matter to the understandings and consciences of gentlemen on both sides of the House. It is not a matter of party politics. I do not, on the ground of party, oppose this measure.

But, sir, I must hurry on to consider what this indemnity will cost you; what will be the expenses of this suit, to reduce to possession this pledge. What will you have to pay for the instrument, by which you are to carve out your own remedy? Will it not cost much more than you will actually obtain? What is this project, as described by General Pinckney? To reduce the fortress of St. Augustine—to occupy East Florida. What force will this require? Omitting the walled towns of Flanders, and Quebec, and Gibraltar, St. Augustine is the strongest place, by nature and art, in the world. Attend to the description of it in the papers produced. Recollect the failure of General Oglethorpe, in the year 1739, and the discomfiture, (I will not say disgrace,) that then, on this account, was attached to the arms of Great Britain, and her colonies.

To give a probability of success to this measure, four thousand regular troops, an immense train of battering artillery, all the volunteer force that Tennessee, South Carolina, and Georgia are able to supply, besides a large number of gunboats, brigs, &c.; ten thousand men, in different ways, must be employed in this expedition, and its connected and associated objects of the subjugation of the Seminoles, the Creeks, and other Indian nations. Even if you are successful, you will lose one-half of your troops by battle or by sickness. You will not be able to commence the siege, until April, and in June the climate would oblige you to abandon it. The troops must come from the upland country of the adjoining States. Sir, it is a medical fact, that they, no more than the men of an extreme northern climate, can endure the intense heat, the pestilential vapors, and the clouds of mosquitoes, that darken and pollute the swamps and sands of Florida. If you are successful, it will be by the destruction of five thousand lives, and by the expenditure of five millions of dollars. Is your object worth this price? If you gain it, you obtain nothing; for that nothing, you pay in a vast effusion of blood and treasure. The Northern and Middle States, those to whom you pretend indemnity, obtain none. They bear their full, their over proportion, in the expenses of this new war, and obtain no compensation at last. I must dismiss this point of indemnity, not because it is exhausted, but because I feel myself trespassing on your patience.

The second general justificatory ground on which this measure is defended, is that of necessity—the apprehension of the use that may be made of the country, by our enemy; or, in the words of the honorable gentleman from Georgia, a military measure of self-defence. Sir, I do not mean to undervalue this plea; there are palpable occasions, and desperate emergencies in which it may rightfully be urged. Salus populi suprema lex. I will not say, that if the danger is instant and imminent, that an enemy can and will seize a point of annoyance, that we ought not to anticipate his design; but I do say, that if the danger apprehended be inconsiderable, remote, and contingent, and, especially, if it be but too apparently matter of artificial contrivance, proceeding from your own wrong, attended with circumstances of suspicion, that it never can warrant so atrocious an act as that of seizing on the territory of a friendly neutral power. Gentlemen must all allow that it is an act exhibiting a most signal exception to the general pacific policy, the cautious forbearance, the solicitous neutrality of this country. It is, at once, an overthrow of all our sublime and romantic theories of the laws of nations, and, especially, of our profound system of controlling warlike and ambitious States, by the precepts of justice, philosophy, and philanthropy; it is a lash of satire that cuts to pieces all the pretty, flowery phrases of Mr. JEFFERSON, and shivers into a thousand shreds the sturdy dissertations of Mr. MADISON. This country was but lately deemed the last retreat and sanctuary of the good old-fashioned law of nations; we affected to reverence that law, and the virtues on which it was founded; and we acknowledged, and congratulated ourselves upon the benefits which were its result. On this account we have been comparatively happy at home, and applauded and admired abroad. This national habit and disposition has been worth to us fleets and armies; and, combined with ordinary foresight, with strict impartiality, and a continuance of the Washingtonian policy of preparing in peace for war, would still avail us as our cheap and efficient defence.

Sir, what is the point on which this plea of necessity rests? What is the danger apprehended? The occupation of Florida by England. But it is three years since you have had, or feigned this fear; this is the third time you have called us to drive out the wolves from among the sheep. But the English, restrained by their Treaty of Alliance, which guaranties the integrity of the Spanish Empire, have shown no inclination to go there, and, while your present law remains, never will. They know, of course, as well as you do, the contingency upon which, by the law of 1810, you have placed your right or intention of occupying East Florida. It would be an act as impolitic in itself as treacherous to their allies, to create that very contingency which is to be the apology of your operations, and the occasion of immense mischief to their friends. They benefit their friends by forbearance; they embarrass you; they suspend you in a ridiculous attitude, panting with the eagerness of desire and the pressure of prohibition. They have made no attempt to seize East Florida; they will make none. But if, by the adoption of the act now under consideration, you alter your present policy, and, fatigued with waiting for English aggression, and despising the contingent remainder, you grasp at a present absolute estate, their system, both of policy in regard to themselves, and of good-will to their allies, of course, must change. The moment you raise your entrenchments against St. Augustine, the English will succor it, and defeat your enterprise. You have drawn attention to your project, you have served them with a notice. Withdraw your troops from East Florida, where they have been now for two years; abandon this undertaking, and you are secure from English interference or Spanish aggression. Let them alone, and they will let you alone. It appears to me, clearly, that the adoption of this bill accelerates and renders certain the very event which you have reason to dread. Then, sir, the ground of necessity not only fails you, but the reasons you render are converted against you.

But the Spaniards will excite the Indians. Do not the papers before us prove that the Indians were peaceable, undisturbed, undisturbed until you invaded Florida? Put an end to your invasion and you put an end to Indian excitement. Indians on their own soil defend themselves, and this you call crime; they retaliate, as far as they can, your wrong, and this you call abomination. But the Spaniards seduce the negroes. Is the fact verified? How can they have communication with the negroes of Georgia? And if they had, did they ever do so until you invaded their territory—until you had promised fifty acres of land to every Spaniard who would betray his country and violate his allegiance? It stands an undisputed fact, that Matthews, the agent of this Government, did this; Mr. Foster expressly charges it on Mr. Monroe, and he does not deny the fact. He admits it. I appeal to the correspondence of November 1811. In the whole progress of this business you make your previous wrong an apology for subsequent wrong. All the evils that have happened, all that you apprehend, are the necessary and natural consequences of your previous acts;

“I do the wrong, and first begin the brawl.
The secret mischiefs that I set abroad
I lay unto the grievous charge of others.”

But so far from its being a sound position that military necessity irresistibly compels you to this measure, I venture to assert that, in a merely military point of view, you cannot do anything so erroneous, probably so fatal, as the occupation of East Florida.

If you mean to press this undertaking with zeal, and with that ardor and promptitude that can alone give you a chance of success, the whole force of the Southern country ought, in May next, to be driving at this object. Will you not, then, invite an invasion by Great Britain, at the very spot, at the very time she desires? This enterprise will, at any rate, suggest to her the design, because it affords the opportunity, the enviable opportunity, of causing a diversion from your Canada project, and dispensing, at the same time, the most effectual relief to their allies. I ask whether this project, drawing, as it necessarily must, the whole of the Southern defensive force from the points of defence, does not insure an invasion from your present enemy, and at the very point where, from peculiar circumstances, you are the most vulnerable?

Gentlemen seem to hug themselves in the notion that Charleston is secure, as though that were the only point to be preserved. But examine the maps of that country, recollect the military and naval operations of colonial times, and inquire into the practicability of an English fleet entering the harbor of Port Royal, and effecting, at that point, the invasion of the Southern States? Your whole effective force is engaged, at the distance of several hundred miles, in foreign conquest. Would you not soon be compelled to raise your siege of the capital of Florida, and, hurrying home to relieve a deserted and unprotected country—pursued by the emancipated and enraged troops of St. Augustine—harassed night and day by parties of Seminoles and Creeks—arrive, if you arrived at all, faint and exhausted, to encounter a new and formidable enemy? Proceed with this fatal enterprise, and deplorable indeed will be the fate of our Southern brethren.

It is made matter of serious accusation against the Spaniards that, in defence of their own homes, they intend to employ black troops. I do not know what right we have to dictate to them on this important point of complexion. We provoke to combat. We are assailants, and for plunder, and yet undertake to prescribe to our devoted victim the mode of his defence. Black troops were employed by Spain, in 1739, at the same place, and for the same purpose they are now employed. England has thousands and tens of thousands of black and colored troops in her pay, as I am afraid we shall, to our cost, discover.

We employed black troops in the war of our Revolution. The State of Rhode Island raised a black regiment. But though we have neither the power nor the right to prohibit the employment of such troops by our enemy, I admit, as has been suggested, that the consequences may be tremendous. That unhappy species of population which prevails in our Southern country, aroused to reflection by the sight of black soldiers and black officers, may suspect themselves to be fellow-men, and fondly dream they likewise could be soldiers and officers. The bloody tragedy of St Domingo may be acted over again in this devoted country. If your enemy has half the malignity of motive, or atrocity of design which, for the purpose of goading a reluctant people to drag on an unprofitable and unnecessary war, you daily impute to him, he will aid in this nefarious business.

Refrain, then, from this measure, which has such a host of evils in its train. If I were a citizen of South Carolina or Georgia I should doubly deplore and deprecate this attack on St. Augustine. I would down on my knees to entreat the Government to forbear. I should protest against this withdrawing all the efficient force of the country to a distant and dangerous point for the purpose of a wicked war of offence, when all that force will be wanted for defence and protection at home, and to repel the invasion which this measure will inevitably suggest and superinduce. I do address this consideration most sincerely and solemnly to the honorable gentlemen from those States. Take care that while you are pursuing foreign conquest your own homes are not devastated. Take care that while your war eagle is soaring a sublime and romantic flight, and "beating widely on the wing for prey," her own eyry be not plundered, and she compelled to turn her course homeward "her pinions guided by her young one's cries." Will you, for the chance of conquering East Florida, of annexing the island of Amelia to your territory, of satisfying the cupidity of land speculators, or even of gratifying a mistaken sense of interest in a respectable State, encounter the terrible contingencies, the almost certain horrors of negro insurrection, of Indian hostility, of midnight conflagration, of wide-spread ruin and indiscriminate massacre?

Sir, it appears to me that the prominent argument that is urged for the adoption of this measure, viz: the war with England, is the strongest argument against it. What is the great object of your policy, your solitary hope of success in your war against England? It is avowed to be the conquest of Canada. How is this to be effected? By frittering your force into various divisions—an army of the South, an army of the North, and an army of the West? No, sir; if, like our ally, France, we are impelled by this lust of conquest, and aspire to like success, we must adopt her mode of insuring it. Select one great point for attainment, and, keeping that steadily in view, press upon it with all the energy of your means. Why scatter your forces in numerous frivolous and unavailing plans? Why not make one grand, undivided effort, and conquer Canada? Why divert into such various channels that force which ought to be accumulated, and contracted into one irresistible torrent? By pursuing both, we shall be disappointed in both objects. Your war with Spain will ruin your war with England. Your war with England will ruin your war with Spain. Is it true that a war with England, and, at the same time, with Spain, has always been intended? Last year the propositions to seize East Florida and to conquer Canada were associated. The inducements then held out were, an enlargement and arrondissement of the territory at the two extremities; a fair division of the spoil. We consent that you may conquer Canada, permit us to conquer Florida. The declaration that Canada should be conquered and retained was the exacted pledge of the Northern men who voted for the war. You have got their votes—you have not, you cannot redeem your pledge. How is it that the proposition for seizing Florida is revived, and so strenuously enforced, and so little is said, or done, or wished as to the conquest and incorporation of Canada? Where is the promised benefit to the North?

But, sir, it seems a point of honor demands that we should continue our efforts to reduce the fortress of St. Augustine, because the Spaniards refuse an amnesty to those worthy individuals who were willing to betray their country into our hands. Not only our sympathies are addressed, and even our deliberate approbation challenged for traitors and conspirators, dignified with the name of patriots, but we are invoked, for their sakes solely, to plunge into a new war; and to this we are invoked, in the hallowed name of the national faith. It is almost degradation to be obliged to examine such an allegation. Have we not denied the acts of Matthews?—refused to ratify them? I will not say that, by this, the Government did not violate its faith with Matthews. So far as it relates to this, instead of imputing exclusive blame to this unfortunate, and, as I understand, confessedly meritorious officer, I cannot but believe that he thought he acted with perfect good faith to the Government, strictly in virtue of his private, if not public instructions, and that he counted, not only on the support, but the applause of Government. Cruelly disappointed in the result, he conceived that he had just cause of complaint. He considered himself the victim of a temporizing, vacillating, insidious policy; and I ask the honorable gentleman from Georgia, did not Matthews die with such sentiments trembling to the very last on his lips? The averment of his own honor and innocence—of the tergiversation and pusillanimity of his employers? Was he not hurrying on to Washington, literally for his vindication, when, fortunately for those he had it in his power to expose, death arrested his course? But, sir, what is the ground of the Government? They distinctly assert that Matthews has transcended his powers, that he has acted without the scope of his authority. He cannot, say the Government, produce our letter of permission to sanction what he has done. Then, clearly, the consequence is, our faith was not compromised, for our name and authority were not legally or fairly used. Our sympathies cannot justly be awakened for those conspirators. We are not interested in this amnesty. Let the Spanish Government deal with these men as we should have done with Arnold, had he fallen into our power. Let them meet the punishment of traitors, or, let them, rousing themselves into a new, and, by us, unprompted effort, deserve to be successful. Let them take the chance of being rebels or patriots—of swallowing the hemlock, or being crowned with myrtle.

That, indeed, is suspicious patriotism, which bargains beforehand for foreign aid; that is hardly a valorous patriotism that submits nothing to hazard, that conditions for amnesty before guilt, and secures the spoil, without fighting the battle. I will not say I have no sympathy for these people. I would save them if I could; but I will not, on their account, endanger my country's peace or fame. But another claim upon our honor is, our troops were attacked at Moosa. Moosa, where is it? Within two miles of the fortress of St. Augustine. And, if you had the camp of an enemy at Georgetown, threatening the Capitol—the existence of your Government; a foreign force, combined with domestic traitors, to overwhelm you, to throw you neck and heels into the Potomac, as one of your choice spirits once proposed, would you not attack? This is, of all others, the most miserable subterfuge. Good God! where are we? In what age do we live? In what country, when it is made a crime to extirpate the invaders of our native soil? In what age, in what country, when it is made a virtue for a nation, itself at war for neutral rights, to invade an unoffending, helpless, friendly, neutral country?

But, it is asked, is not this measure defensible on the ground of precedents, and the practices of nations? O yes, undoubtedly. For this, as for every other enormity, you can find an example, but not a justification. I am apprehensive, sir, that in pursuing this unprofitable reference to precedents and authorities, less skilful than the learned gentlemen who have preceded me, I cannot avoid giving to my remarks an air of pedantry. I call this an unprofitable, and, perhaps, deceptive pursuit, because a recent experience shows how pervertible are the clearest texts of the soundest authors. For, when I discovered the honorable Chairman making quotations from Vattel, in support of the present proposition, which authorizes us to take possession of that to which we have no right, I could not help recollecting that, attending as a spectator in your gallery, during the debate on Mr. Ross's resolution, I heard the same honorable gentleman adduce passages from the same author to prove that we ought not to take what of perfect right did belong to us.

The earliest precedent on record was the one so pleasantly, not irreverently, alluded to by the honorable gentlemen from Vermont, who is, without question, of any one among us, the best read in the most ancient and authentic of all histories, the Holy Bible—who, at any rate, does the most frequently and the most aptly quote the Scriptures that were written for our instruction. He referred to the leading case of Ahab and Naboth. Sir, I will not dwell upon it long enough to inquire who is the Jezebel that has inspired our councils. I will not ask, in the language of Mr. Barlow, whether this is not the mode devised, "the least onerous to the French treasury," to do us a nominal favor and a real injury? But, I believe, and I hope, (I say hope while it is lawful to say so,) that the answer of the insulted and oppressed Spaniards will be that of Naboth to Ahab, "The Lord forbid it me that I should give the inheritance of my fathers unto thee."

But do gentlemen prefer classical to Biblical authority? the example of a Republic, or, rather, an aristocracy to a theocracy? Lacedæmon afforded it. The fortress of Cadmea was won by a Lacedæmonian general by the same means of treasonable correspondence which our general has used. The Ephori condemned their general, as we have done, but retained their conquest. Do you want an instance from history to condemn you, to make you blush for your conduct? Take it from Florence—a real Republic. With a territory so small, as to render the desire of its extension natural and pardonable, such was the magnanimity of its Republican character, its inviolable adherence to principle, and its abhorrence of the “selfish object of territorial aggrandizement,” that when the city of Arezzo was betrayed into its hands, it disdained to profit by the treason, and restored that city to its freedom and independence. In what age, did this happen? In comparatively a benighted period, the thirteenth century. Will you, Americans,—you who have styled yourselves the most enlightened people, of a most enlightened age, be put to shame, by such an event happening, in such an era; in such a country?

But still, you have a thousand instances to encourage you. You have not the merit of novelty in your wickedness. Deeds as reprehensible, as nefarious as yours, and on the same grounds and pretences, crowd and deform the page of history. The annals of despotism help you out. Louis XIV was in the heart of the Netherlands, before it was known he had a pretence to any part of those rich provinces, under a pretended right of his wife. Frederick of Prussia, in 1741, gave the intimation of his claim against Silesia, at the head of 60,000 men. Shall I mention the two divisions of Poland, the recent instances of French usurpation, in Holland, in Switzerland, in Portugal, in Italy, and Spain? No; these instances are too identical for illustration. It is unnecessary to exhibit those instances, of which your proceedings are but polygraphic copies. I will hasten to the great precedent, which has been alluded to on both sides, as affording pertinent matter for illustration—the seizure of the Danish fleet.

I have a right to refer to it triumphantly, as an argumentum ad hominem. All the disinterested part of mankind condemned this measure. In this country, all parties, Federal and Republican, assailed it. Let me prove a measure to be within the scope of the policy of that—let me prove a conformity, or even a strong analogy of conduct, and the proof concludes;—the argument is victorious, against any individual or party in this country, the author of such a measure—more especially against those who were instinctively offended with Copenhagen Jackson—more especially against the present Administration—the assertors of neutral rights; the assertors of exclusive territorial rights, even in cases of doubtful or common jurisdiction. So sensible was the honorable gentleman from Tennessee, on my right, of this, that in the early stages of this discussion he directed his most vigorous efforts to dislodge this train of ideas from the mind of the Senate. The gentleman showed his usual correctness and acuteness, in discovering the stress of the argument, and selecting the turning point. But what was his mode of refutation? How did he attempt to efface the impression that was instantly made on our minds, when the similarity of our conduct to that of the English in seizing the Danish fleet, was referred to by the honorable gentleman from Vermont? Why, forsooth, by joining in the denunciation against that measure—by magnifying its injustice—by exaggerating, if possible, its enormity—by darkening its atrocity. Sir, this may be allowable in rhetoric, but it is, at best, but an able evasion of the very point, which a not over strict logic would say, he was bound to meet. The gentleman expressed his surprise, that any American could charge his country with an intention to perform an act so nefarious, as that of the seizure of the Danish fleet by the English. Sir, I am not obliged to contend, though with the utmost fairness and propriety I might, that our contemplated act transcends that in enormity, in its outrage on the laws of nations, in its prostration of the principles of right and justice.

One point of difference we surely cannot forget, viz: that the Danish fleet was first demanded, and demanded from those who had a right to cede it. In this case, you have made no demand; and, even if you had, it is of those who have no right to convey. The mere local authorities of Florida have no right to dismember the Spanish empire. Another point of difference is, that the French were at hand. They occupied a part of Denmark, the Dutchy of Holstein. Their ulterior success, which was not only probable, but inevitable, would have given them possession of the Danish fleet. In addition to this, the English Ministry urged (with what propriety of course I cannot tell) the secret articles of the Treaty of Tilsit, in justification of this measure.

But, after all, it was an indefensible act, deserving all the epithets of reprobation, which the honorable gentleman has bestowed upon it. It was as fatal in its effects, as censurable in its principle. It gave the hearts of the Danish nation to France, it made it an ally of the Continental system; it startled Sweden, it irritated Russia, it turned the tide of public opinion against Ministers in England, it alarmed and alienated America;—and for all this, Britain gained sixteen hulks, some tons of hemp, and naval stores—and the distrust of the world.

Of all the ill-consequences resulting to Great Britain from this act, the most deeply fatal to her was the opinion, justly entertained in England and in America—the only remaining countries where public opinion retains through the press and the freedom of institutions any operation—that she, who pretended to execrate the outrages of Bonaparte, who professed a reverence for the laws of nations, and declared herself the advocate of the principles of justice, virtue, and religion, should, overcome by the lure of gain, or intimidated by an unreal necessity, have fallen from her high pretensions, have forfeited her moral character, have stained her hitherto comparatively spotless reputation. In miserable contradiction to herself, she overthrew, at one blow, that system of universal public law, whose maxims and precedents have been long acknowledged, and by no nation more than herself, to be of the same force and obligation as the municipal constitutions of particular States: "A system," as it is observed by Lord Erskine, in his celebrated protest upon this subject, "which has gradually ripened with the advancement of learning and the extension of commerce, and which ought to be held sacred and inviolable by all Governments, as binding the whole world under one politic and moral dominion."

I implore you, sir, that we still adhere to this system; that wise and philanthropic system, that is founded on justice, that favors the innocent, that protects the weak, that suspects and opposes the strong and the unprincipled; that disdains conspiracy in usurpation, and fellowship in guilt, though the spoil of defenceless and afflicted neighbors be the bribe, and the splendid example of exalted potentates the justification.

By abandoning this system what has Europe become? A scene of ruins. And still, amid these very ruins, we meet at every turn the flames of war bursting out anew into wider conflagration. Let us adhere to the ancient system of the laws of nations. Let us snatch this sacred palladium from its burning temple, and reconsecrate it in this our new and virtuous Empire.

I perceive, sir, that time will not permit me to examine this question in the various other relations which have suggested themselves to my mind. I have so strong an opinion, that this, as a military enterprise, will, having regard to our present and probable means, after all, prove abortive and unfortunate; that I had almost felt myself emboldened to submit my reasons for that opinion. St. Augustine, without a naval superiority, cannot be subdued, let General Pinckney, brave and intelligent as I know him to be, do his best. My reasons would be drawn from a detailed consideration of General Oglethorpe's operations in 1739. I have consulted various accounts of that siege. I have a plan of his attack, taken by an engineer employed in the service, now before me. Oglethorpe's best chance of success depended on his naval superiority. But he was defeated. Can we, then, hope for success, when the sea is open to Spanish and British squadrons, and when, so far as relates to our naval preparations, we have committed the same mistake here as in our Canadian campaign; a mistake, or rather negligence, that has been the principal, if not the sole cause of our repeated disasters. But this subject, in all its military bearing, has been and can be so much better illustrated by the honorable gentleman from Maryland, that I forbear to enlarge upon it. I leave, also, to that gentleman and others, the important topic of the disastrous consequences of this measure to the miserable remains of our foreign commerce. The conjectures and predictions that Spain will not, because she cannot—from the depression of her fortunes, the inadequacy of her means, and the imbecility of her national character—resent this lawless aggression, I believe rather illustrative of the meanness of our motives than of the true nature of her disposition and resources. The merchants, those who have the best means of knowing, distinctly understand, that your hostile occupation of East Florida will be the signal of the immediate confiscation of American property. In relation to the interests of my own State, the consequences of this measure will be indeed deplorable. The little remnant of trade we have left is that to the Havana, which will be inevitably cut off. And it is a singular fact, well known to my honorable colleague, that real property, plantations of a very considerable value, in the island of Cuba, belong to native citizens of the State of Rhode Island. They are owned principally by the fast friends of the present Administration; by gentlemen who have already loaned to the Government more than some whole patriotic States, and whose private armed ships have captured from the enemy more than half a million sterling. These, to be sure, are not considerations of great moment. Since gentlemen choose to sacrifice their friends, it is officious in me to interfere perhaps; but they are my constituents, and I deem it my duty to suggest their danger and their interests.

But there are resulting from this measure political consequences connected with your foreign relations, with your present war with England, with the present peculiar circumstances of the world, which are worthy of the gravest consideration. Do you wish to make the present contest with England popular beyond any instance in their history? To unite against you the undivided opinions, the enthusiastic feelings, the animated efforts, of the English people? To make this a war indefinite in continuance, vindictive in its mode of operation, and victorious to England in the end? Do you mean to render suspected, and of course unavailing, all your pacificatory propositions? Then do this dastardly act against a helpless people; wage your war with Spain. If ever there was an object which united the opinions of the British nation, it was the late Spanish revolution. If there ever was an object in which the hopes, interests, and efforts of the English nation concurred, it is Spanish emancipation. This act of yours will entirely alienate from us our friends in the British Parliament. We shall be so notoriously in the wrong that no one in that Assembly will dare defend us. But a few months ago we could refer to the majority that effected the repeal of the Orders in Council, as equally the advocates of their own best national interests, and of our most important national rights. We unwisely continue our war with England after the acquisition of the great avowed object of that war. The people of England now understand that we fight on the single ground of maritime rights. And they are taught to believe that this cruel contest is intended not so much for our own protection as for their destruction. On this ground of maritime rights are placed the pride, the hopes, the fears, of this sometimes misgoverned, but always magnanimous nation.

Add, then, a Spanish war to your English war, and you will not have a friend left in England. Do gentlemen affect to deem this of no consequence? Then they have forgotten history, or read it but to little advantage. Sir, this Spanish war will corroborate into certainty the suspicion (the unjust, the unworthy suspicion, if you please,) that our councils are influenced by an undue partiality for France. I am not taking upon myself to say that this would be a fair deduction, but the adoption of this measure would give an apparent sanction to this accusation, which we ought to avoid when we can so easily avoid it, not only without detriment, but with safety and advantage. Let us not only be chaste, but unsuspected. What will be the inevitable consequence of a war with Spain? A non-intercourse with the Peninsula. The great object of France will be effected. This in addition to our concurrence in the Continental system, and our war with England, is all that the Ruler of France, in the insolence of his power, the extravagance of his desires, the arrogance of his contempt, or the deadliness of his hatred, sanguine, haughty, insatiable, exorbitant and inexorable as he is, ever demanded from us, and more than he could ever expect to obtain even from our trembling acquiescence.

It will seem to England that this coincidence in conduct must arise from coincidence in views. She would deem us a party in the great design of her vindictive foe, and our impolitic and unfortunate war would be by her associated in principle and duration with that war, which she now wages for her own security, and the liberation of mankind. Sir, I must conclude. The subject is not exhausted, but I am. I will not attempt to recapitulate or arrange in a more correct and compact form the desultory remarks I have thrown out. But I must demand it of every individual member of the Senate, again and again to ask himself what right have we to the territory of East Florida? Is it any other than the right created by desire—the right suggested by ambition—the right of taking advantage of the troubles of our neighbors—of plundering weakness, of imposing on misfortune, of oppressing the oppressed? What right would Spain have to occupy St. Mary's, or Cumberland island? The same we have to occupy Augustine and Amelia.

I have directed my attention solely to East Florida. The other member of the question, in regard to the Mobile, is easily disposed of. If the territory be ours under the treaties and laws of the United States, there is no need of this law to authorize the President to take possession. He ought to do it by the obligation of general duty. He wants no particular law to enable him to assert the claims of the United States. He must take care that the laws and treaties are executed. He encounters no hazardous responsibility; he is empowered so to do, not by a constructive, but by a plain, direct, and absolute authority.

Sir, let us presume, for a moment, that we shall be completely successful as to the attainment of these countries; that they cost us no money, no blood, no actual privation, no present suffering. Will not this policy of indefinitely increasing our territory be productive of the most baneful future consequences? Is it not accelerating that fatal event which the genuine friends of freedom have foreboded and deprecated as the catastrophe of our political drama? We have conquered Louisiana by our money; we aspire to the possession of Canada; we intend to occupy the Floridas; we have relinquished our system of philanthropy towards the Indians; we are extinguishing Indian claims in Indian blood. The Indian tribes are no longer our fellow-citizens and red brethren, but wretches to be hated, barbarians to be exterminated. All external pressure binding us into union is to be removed. All cause of external alarm and apprehension is to be put at rest. A careless and indolent security will ensue, or, what is worse, a restless ambition and turbulent arrogance will seek new gratifications, interfere with the concerns of other nations, meditate further conquest; and the fatal result will be, that this fortunate and homogeneous composition of pure and simple Republics will be a vast empire, made up of various foreign States, with discordant institutions, and the conflicting prejudices and passions of irreconcilable interests, which can only be constrained into union and subdued into tranquillity by the energy and power of a single despot; the chief of a mighty army, the oppressor of a once free and virtuous people.

PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE SECOND SESSION OF THE THIRTEENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MONDAY, DECEMBER 6, 1813.

MONDAY, December 6, 1813.

The VICE PRESIDENT being absent, the Senate proceeded to the election of a President pro tempore, as the Constitution provides; and JOSEPH B. VARNUM was appointed.

Ordered, That the Secretary notify the House of Representatives that a quorum is assembled, and are ready to proceed to business.

Ordered, That the Secretary wait on the President of the United States and acquaint him that the Senate have, in the absence of the VICE PRESIDENT, elected JOSEPH B. VARNUM their President pro tempore.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled, and that the House is ready to proceed to business. The House have appointed a committee on their part, jointly with such committee as may be appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled and ready to receive any communications that he may be pleased to make to them.

After passing the usual resolutions for the supply of newspapers, &c., the Senate adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 7.

Mr. ROBINSON reported, from the Joint Committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that the President informed the committee that he would make a communication to the two Houses this day at 12 o'clock.

PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

The following Message was then received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

In meeting you at the present interesting conjuncture, it would have been highly satisfactory if I could have communicated a favorable result to the mission charged with negotiations for restoring peace. It was a just expectation from the respect due to the distinguished Sovereign who had invited them by his offer of mediation; from the readiness with which the invitation was accepted on the part of the United States; and from the pledge to be found in an act of their Legislature for the liberality which their Plenipotentiaries would carry into the negotiations, that no time would be lost by the British Government in embracing the experiment for hastening a stop to the effusion of blood.

A prompt and cordial acceptance of the mediation on that side was the less to be doubted, as it was of a nature not to submit rights or pretensions on either side to the decision of an umpire; but to afford merely an opportunity, honorable and desirable to both, for discussing, and, if possible, adjusting them, for the interest of both.

The British Cabinet, either mistaking our desire of peace for a dread of British power, or misled by other fallacious calculations, has disappointed this reasonable anticipation. No communications from our Envoys having reached us, no information on the subject has been received from that source. But it is known that the mediation was declined in the first instance, and there is no evidence, notwithstanding the lapse of time, that a change of disposition in the British Councils has taken place, or is to be expected.

Under such circumstances, a nation, proud of its rights, and conscious of its strength, has no choice but an exertion of the one in support of the other.

To this determination, the best encouragement is derived from the success with which it has pleased the Almighty to bless our arms, both on the land and on the water.

While proofs have been continued of the enterprise and skill of our cruisers, public and private, on the ocean, and a new trophy gained in the capture of a British by an American vessel of war, after an action giving celebrity to the name of the victorious commander, the great inland waters, on which the enemy were also to be encountered, have presented achievements of our naval arms, as brilliant in their character as they have been important in their consequences.

On Lake Erie, the squadron under command of Captain Perry having met the British squadron of superior force, a sanguinary conflict ended in the capture of the whole. The conduct of that officer, adroit as it was daring, and which was so well seconded by his comrades, justly entitles them to the admiration and gratitude of their country, and will fill an early page in its naval annals, with a victory, never surpassed in lustre, however much it may have been in magnitude.

On Lake Ontario, the caution of the British commander, favored by contingencies, frustrated the efforts of the American commander to bring on a decisive action. Captain Chauncey was able, however, to establish an ascendancy on that important theatre; and to prove, by the manner in which he effected everything possible, that opportunities only were wanted, for a more shining display of his own talents and the gallantry of those under his command.

The success on Lake Erie having opened a passage to the territory of the enemy, the officer commanding the Northwestern army transferred the war thither, and, rapidly pursuing the hostile troops fleeing with their savage associates, forced a general action, which quickly terminated in the capture of the British, and dispersion of the savage force.

This result is signally honorable to Major General Harrison, by whose military talents it was prepared; to Colonel Johnson and his mounted volunteers, whose impetuous onset gave a decisive blow to the ranks of the enemy; and to the spirit of the volunteer militia, equally brave and patriotic, who bore an interesting part in the scene; more especially to the Chief Magistrate of Kentucky, at the head of them, whose heroism, signalized in the war which established the independence of his country, sought, at an advanced age, a share in hardships and battles, for maintaining its rights and its safety.

The effect of these successes has been to rescue the inhabitants of Michigan from their oppressions, aggravated by gross infractions of the capitulation which subjected them to a foreign Power; to alienate the savages of numerous tribes from the enemy, by whom they were disappointed and abandoned; and to relieve an extensive region of country from a merciless warfare which desolated its frontiers, and imposed on its citizens the most harassing services.

In consequence of our naval superiority on Lake Ontario, and the opportunity afforded by it for concentrating our forces by water, operations, which had been provisionally planned, were set on foot against the possessions of the enemy on the St. Lawrence. Such, however, was the delay produced, in the first instance, by adverse weather, of unusual violence and continuance, and such the circumstances attending the final movements of the army, that the prospect, at one time so favorable, was not realized.

The cruelty of the enemy in enlisting the savages into a war with a nation desirous of mutual emulation in mitigating its calamities, has not been confined to any one quarter. Wherever they could be turned against us, no exertions to effect it have been spared. On our Southwestern border, the Creek tribes, who, yielding to our persevering endeavors, were gradually acquiring more civilized habits, became the unfortunate victims of seduction. A war in that quarter has been the consequence, infuriated by a bloody fanaticism, recently propagated among them. It was necessary to crush such a war before it could spread among the contiguous tribes, and before it could favor enterprises of the enemy into that vicinity. With this view, a force was called into the service of the United States from the State of Georgia and Tennessee, which, with the nearest regular troops, and other corps from the Mississippi Territory, might not only chastise the savages into present peace, but make a lasting impression on their fears.

The progress of the expedition, as far as is yet known, corresponds with the martial zeal with which it was espoused; and the best hopes of a satisfactory issue are authorized by the complete success with which a well planned enterprise was executed against a body of hostile savages, by a detachment of the volunteer militia of Tennessee, under the gallant command of General Coffee; and by a still more important victory over a larger body of them, gained under the immediate command of Major General Jackson, an officer equally distinguished for his patriotism and his military talents.

The systematic perseverance of the enemy in courting the aid of the savages in all quarters, had the natural effect of kindling their ordinary propensity to war into a passion, which, even among those best disposed towards the United States, was ready, if not employed on our side, to be turned against us. A departure from our protracted forbearance to accept the services tendered by them, has thus been forced upon us. But, in yielding to it, the retaliation has been mitigated as much as possible, both in its extent and in its character, stopping far short of the example of the enemy, who owe the advantages they have occasionally gained in battle, chiefly to the number of their savage associates; and who have not controlled them either from their usual practice of indiscriminate massacre on defenceless inhabitants, or from scenes of carnage without a parallel, on prisoners to the British arms, guarded by all the laws of humanity and honorable war. For these enormities the enemy are equally responsible, whether with the power to prevent them, they want the will, or, with the knowledge of the want of power, they still avail themselves of such instruments. In other respects, the enemy are pursuing a course which threatens consequences most afflicting to humanity.

A standing law of Great Britain naturalizes, as is well known, all aliens complying with conditions limited to a shorter period than those required by the United States; and naturalized subjects are, in war, employed by her Government in common with native subjects. In a contiguous British province, regulations promulgated since the commencement of the war, compel citizens of the United States being there under certain circumstances to bear arms; whilst, of the native emigrants from the United States, who compose much of the population of the province, a number have actually borne arms against the United States within their limits; some of whom, after having done so, have become prisoners of war, and are now in our possession. The British commander in that province, nevertheless, with the sanction, it appears, of his Government, thought proper to select from American prisoners of war, and send to Great Britain for trial as criminals, a number of individuals, who had emigrated from the British dominions long prior to the state of war between the two nations, who had incorporated themselves into our political society, in the modes recognised by the law and the practice of Great Britain, and who were made prisoners of war, under the banners of their adopted country, fighting for its rights and its safety.

The protection due to these citizens requiring an effectual interposition in their behalf, a like number of British prisoners of war were put into confinement, with a notification that they would experience whatever violence might be committed on the American prisoners of war sent to Great Britain.

It was hoped that this necessary consequence of the step unadvisedly taken on the part of Great Britain would have led her Government to reflect on the inconsistencies of its conduct, and that a sympathy with the British, if not with the American sufferers, would have arrested the cruel career opened by its example.

This was unhappily not the case. In violation both of consistency and humanity, American officers and non-commissioned officers, in double the number of the British soldiers confined here, were ordered into close confinement, with formal notice that, in the event of a retaliation for the death which might be inflicted on the prisoners of war sent to Great Britain for trial, the officers so confined would be put to death also. It was notified, at the same time, that the commanders of the British fleets and armies on our coasts are instructed, in the same event, to proceed with a destructive severity against our towns and their inhabitants.

That no doubt might be left with the enemy of our adherence to the retaliatory resort imposed on us, a correspondent number of British officers, prisoners of war in our hands, were immediately put into close confinement, to abide the fate of those confined by the enemy; and the British Government has been apprized of the determination of this Government, to retaliate any other proceedings against us, contrary to the legitimate modes of warfare.

It is as fortunate for the United States that they have it in their power to meet the enemy in this deplorable contest, as it is honorable to them that they do not join in it but under the most imperious obligations, and with the humane purpose of effectuating a return to the established usages of war.

The views of the French Government on the subjects which have been so long committed to negotiation have received no elucidation since the close of your late session. The Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States at Paris had not been enabled, by proper opportunities, to press the objects of his mission, as prescribed by his instructions.

The militia being always to be regarded as the great bulwark of defence and security for free States, and the Constitution having wisely committed to the national authority a use of that force, as the best provision against an unsafe Military Establishment, as well as a resource peculiarly adapted to a country having the extent and the exposure of the United States, I recommend to Congress a revision of the militia laws, for the purpose of securing more effectually the services of all detachments called into the employment, and placed under the Government of the United States.

It will deserve the consideration of Congress, also, whether, among other improvements in the militia laws, justice does not require a regulation, under due precautions, for defraying the expense incident to the first assembling, as well as the subsequent movements, of detachments called into the national service.

To give to our vessels of war, public and private, the requisite advantage in their cruises, it is of much importance that they should have, both for themselves and their prizes, the use of the ports and markets of friendly Powers. With this view, I recommend to Congress the expediency of such legal provisions as may supply the defects or remove the doubts of the Executive authority to allow to the cruisers of other Powers at war with enemies of the United States, such use of the American ports as may correspond with the privileges allowed by such Powers to American cruisers.

During the year ending on the 30th of September last, the receipts into the Treasury have exceeded thirty-seven millions and a half of dollars, of which near twenty-four millions were the produce of loans. After meeting all the demands for the public service, there remained in the Treasury, on that day, near seven millions of dollars. Under the authority contained in the act of the 2d of August last, for borrowing seven millions and a half of dollars, that sum has been obtained on terms more favorable to the United States than those of the preceding loan made during the present year. Further sums to a considerable amount will be necessary to be obtained in the same way during the ensuing year; and, from the increased capital of the country, from the fidelity with which the public engagements have been kept, and the public credit maintained, it may be expected, on good grounds, that the necessary pecuniary supplies will not be wanting.

The expenses of the current year, from the multiplied operations falling within it, have necessarily been extensive. But, on a just estimate of the campaign, in which the mass of them has been incurred, the cost will not be found disproportionate to the advantages which have been gained. The campaign has, indeed, in its latter stages, in one quarter, been less favorable than was expected; but, in addition to the importance of our naval success, the progress of the campaign has been filled with incidents highly honorable to the American arms.

SENATE.

President's Annual Message.

DECEMBER, 1813.

The attacks of the enemy on Craney Island, on Fort Meigs, on Sackett's Harbor, and on Sandusky, have been vigorously and successfully repulsed; nor have they, in any case, succeeded on either frontier, excepting when directed against the peaceable dwellings of individuals, or villages, unprepared or undefended.

On the other hand, the movements of the American army have been followed by the reduction of York, and of Forts George, Erie, and Malden, by the recovery of Detroit, and the extinction of the Indian war in the West, and by the occupancy or command of a large portion of Upper Canada. Battles have also been fought on the borders of the St. Lawrence, which, though not accomplishing their entire objects, reflect honor on the discipline and prowess of our soldiery, the best auguries of eventual victory. In the same scale are to be placed the late successes in the South, over one of the most powerful, which had become one of the most hostile also, of the Indian tribes.

It would be improper to close this communication without expressing a thankfulness, in which all ought to unite, for the numerous blessings with which our beloved country continues to be favored; for the abundance which overspreads our land, and the prevailing health of its inhabitants; for the preservation of our internal tranquillity, and the stability of our free institutions; and, above all, for the light of Divine truth, and the protection of every man's conscience in the enjoyment of it. And although, among our blessings, we cannot number an exemption from the evils of war, yet these will never be regarded as the greatest of evils, by the friends of liberty and of the rights of nations. Our country has before preferred them to the degraded condition which was the alternative, when the sword was drawn in the cause which gave birth to our national independence; and none who contemplate the magnitude, and feel the value of that glorious event, will shrink from a struggle to maintain the high and happy ground on which it placed the American people.

With all good citizens, the justice and necessity of resisting wrongs and usurpations no longer to be borne, will sufficiently outweigh the privations and sacrifices inseparable from a state of war. But it is a reflection, moreover, peculiarly consoling, that, whilst wars are generally aggravated by their baneful effects on the internal improvements and permanent prosperity of the nations engaged in them, such is the favored situation of the United States, that the calamities of the contest, into which they have been compelled to enter, are mitigated by improvements and advantages of which the contest itself is the source.

If the war has increased the interruptions of our commerce, it has, at the same time, cherished and multiplied our manufactures, so as to make us independent of all other countries for the more essential branches, for which we ought to be dependent on none; and is even rapidly giving them an extent which will create additional staples in our future intercourse with foreign markets.

If much treasure has been expended, no inconsiderable portion of it has been applied to objects durable in their value, and necessary to our permanent safety.

If the war has exposed us to increased spoliation on the ocean, and to predatory incursions on the land, it has developed the national means of retaliating the former, and of providing protection against the latter; demonstrating to all, that every blow aimed at our maritime independence is an impulse accelerating the growth of our maritime power.

By diffusing through the mass of the nation the elements of military discipline and instruction, by augmenting and distributing warlike preparations, applicable to future use; by evincing the zeal and valor with which they will be employed, and the cheerfulness with which every necessary burden will be borne, a greater respect for our rights, and a longer duration of our future peace, are promised, than could be expected without these proofs of the national character and resources.

The war has proved, moreover, that our free Government, like other free Governments, though slow in its early movements, acquires in its progress a force proportioned to its freedom; and that the Union of these States, the guardian of the freedom and safety of all and of each, is strengthened by every occasion that puts it to the test.

In fine, the war, with its vicissitudes, is illustrating the capacity and the destiny of the United States to be a great, a flourishing, and a powerful nation, worthy of the friendship which it is disposed to cultivate with all others; and authorized, by its own example, to require from all an observance of the laws of justice and reciprocity. Beyond these their claims have never extended; and, in contending for these, we behold a subject for our congratulations, in the daily testimony of increasing harmony throughout the nation, and may humbly repose our trust in the smiles of Heaven on so righteous a cause.

[CONFIDENTIAL.]

THURSDAY, December 9.

The following confidential Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The tendency of our commercial and navigation laws, in their present state, to favor the enemy and thereby prolong the war, is more and more developed by experience. Supplies of the most essential kinds find their way not only to British ports and British armies at a distance, but the armies in our neighborhood, with which our own are contending, derive from our ports and outlets a subsistence attainable with difficulty, if at all, from other sources. Even the fleets and troops infesting our coasts and waters, are, by like supplies, accommodated and encouraged in their predatory and incursive warfare.

Abuses having a like tendency take place in our import trade. British fabrics and products find their way into our ports under the name and from the ports of other countries, and often in British vessels disguised as neutrals by false colors and papers.

To these abuses it may be added, that illegal importations are openly made, with advantage to the violators of the law, produced by undervaluations or other circumstances involved in the course of the judicial proceedings against them.

It is found, also, that the practice of ransoming is a cover for collusive captures, and a channel for intelligence advantageous to the enemy.

To remedy, as much as possible, those evils, I recommend—

That an effectual embargo on exports be immediately enacted:

That all articles known to be derived, either not at all, or in an immaterial degree only, from the productions of any other country than Great Britain, and particularly the extensive articles made of wool and cotton materials, and ardent spirits made from the cane, be expressly and absolutely prohibited, from whatever port or place, or in whatever vessels the same may be brought into the United States; and that all violations of the non-importation act be subjected to adequate penalties:

That, among the proofs of the neutral and national character of foreign vessels, it be required that the masters and supercargoes, and three-fourths at least of the crews, be citizens or subjects of the country under whose flag the vessels sail:

That all persons concerned in collusive captures by the enemy, or in ransoming vessels or their cargoes from the enemy, be subjected to adequate penalties.

To shorten as much as possible the duration of the war, it is indispensable that the enemy should feel all the pressure that can be given to it, and the restraints having that tendency will be borne with the greater cheerfulness by all good citizens, as the restraints will affect those most who are most ready to sacrifice the interests of their country in pursuit of their own.

JAMES MADISON.

DECEMBER 9, 1813.

The Message was read, and referred to the committee this day appointed on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our Foreign Relations, with leave to report thereon by bill or otherwise.

MONDAY, December 13.

Mr. BIBB, from the committee appointed the 9th instant on the subject, reported, in part, a bill laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States; which was in part read.

A confidential message was received from the House of Representatives, by Messrs. GRUNDY and LEWIS, two of their members; Mr. GRUNDY, Chairman:

Mr. President: The House of Representatives have passed a bill (in confidence) "laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read; and on motion, by Mr. BIBB, that the bill be now read the second time, it was objected to as against the rule.

On motion, by Mr. BIBB, it was agreed to suspend the twelfth rule for conducting business in the Senate, so far as the same relates to the second reading of the bill at this time: And the bill was read the second time, and referred to the committee appointed the 9th instant, on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to our Foreign Relations, to consider and report thereon.

On motion, by Mr. GILES,

Ordered, That the bill this day reported by the committee last mentioned, be recommitted to the original committee, to consider and report thereon.

Mr. BIBB, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported the bill from the House of Representatives with amendments; which were read.

A motion was made, by Mr. SMITH, that the bill and amendments be confidentially printed for the use of the Senate; and, on motion, by Mr. CAMPBELL, the question was divided; and it was agreed that the amendments to the bill, as reported by the committee, be confidentially printed for the use of the Senate.

TUESDAY, December 14.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and Mr. ANDERSON was requested to take the Chair.

Whereupon, the amendments were amended

THURSDAY, December 16.

THE EMBARGO.

Mr. FROMENTIN, from the committee, reported the amendments to the bill, entitled "An act laying an embargo on all ships and vessels in the ports and harbors of the United States," correctly engrossed; and the bill was read the third time as amended.

Mr. MASON, of New Hampshire, rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President:—Knowing that the advocates of the bill under consideration are averse to a full discussion of its merits, and that a speedy decision is determined on, I do not intend to trespass a long time on your patience. But believing this measure to be pregnant with consequences the most pernicious to our country, I cannot permit it to pass without entering against it my solemn protest. You are about to change the daily occupations, and destroy the means of a subsistence, of a vast portion of your population. To remove all obstacles in the way of your rapid march, you have set aside an ancient and useful rule, expressly designed to protect against hasty and inconsiderate determinations. This subject, in the decision of which are involved the dearest interests of the people, you have ordered to be debated and decided in secret. Why is public discussion prohibited? The matter under consideration has become the subject of newspaper paragraphs, and is, at this hour, as well known in the principal cities of the Union as in this Hall. We, who are bound to act on our high responsibility, are the only persons in the nation who may not seek information to govern our conduct.

At the last session of Congress, immediately after the important act regulating our foreign trade had been passed, a bill, similar in its general provisions to that now before us, was hastily brought forward, and although strongly recommended by the President of the United States, was, after much discussion, rejected. That bill, by the terms of it, was limited in its duration to the present time. The President, persevering in his former opinion, has again recommended the measure, and full confidence is expressed that it will now be adopted. The Message of the President contains no new information, and we have heard no new reasoning. The reasons in favor of the bill are certainly less weighty now than at the last session. It was then urged, that during the mild weather of the Summer, the enemy was able so to blockade our harbors, that, without his permission, nothing would escape, and therefore the duration of the act then proposed was limited to the beginning of Winter, when the tempestuous weather and long nights afford opportunities of escaping the blockading squadrons. Whence, then, this confidence, that a measure so lately rejected will now be adopted? To those not favored with the confidence of the Administration, the reasons of this supposed change of opinion are not apparent.

The evil complained of is, that our enemy obtains from this country supplies of provisions essential for the subsistence of his fleets and armies. To remedy this, the bill prohibits all exports of every kind. Why does the prohibition extend to any commodities other than provisions? Or, at most, to such as may, in some way, be useful to his fleets or armies? The object is said to be to distress our enemy, and disable him to carry on the war. It is important to inquire, who will be most injured, our enemies or ourselves? For if, on examination, it should be found that the loss and injury will fall mostly on our citizens, a wise and dispassionate Legislature will find no sufficient inducement to assent to the bill, in the apparently consolatory reflection in the President's Message, "that the restraints will affect those most who are most ready to sacrifice the interests of their country in pursuit of their own." To determine what will be the effect on our enemy, we must know his wants, and to what degree they are relieved by supplies from this country. We have no evidence, nor even an estimate, of the quantity of provisions which the enemy obtains from our country. Had he obtained such supplies to a great amount, it would seem the Government must have some evidence of the facts. If the Government does possess such evidence, it is to be regretted that it has not been laid before the Legislature. Destitute of evidence, we are obliged to act on conjecture.

The enemy is supposed to have obtained from this country supplies, consisting principally of flour for his troops in the West Indies and at Halifax. These supplies must have gone mostly through the medium of neutrals. Existing laws prohibit, under heavy penalties, all trading with the enemy. Few, if any, prosecutions have been instituted on those laws. It is to be presumed, therefore, that our citizens have not often transgressed them. The scarcity of provisions at the places mentioned may be judged of by their prices, which, during the past Summer, have not been unusually high. Flour has also been exported to Spain and Portugal, but this is mostly for the use of the inhabitants. The allied armies are removed too far into the interior of the country to draw their supplies from Lisbon and Cadiz, the places to which our flour is chiefly carried. I trust it does not enter into the policy of the Government to distress any portion of the Spanish people, except what is in arms against France.

That the necessities of the enemy are urgent, is rendered almost incredible by the fact, that he exerts his utmost power to prevent supplies going from this country. A rigorous blockade was last Spring instituted, and has ever since been enforced on the ports from which our provisions were usually exported in the greatest quantities. Discovering that the article of flour began to find its way out of the country, through Long Island Sound, he has lately extended the blockade to all that coast. Can we suppose the enemy anxious to obtain provisions, or other produce of this country, while he thus throws every obstacle in his power in the way of their getting to him?

But it has been urged, and seems to be relied on, as the strongest reason in favor of the bill, that the hostile ships and squadrons on our coast draw from the country necessary supplies, which they could not otherwise obtain. Here again, in the absence of all evidence, we must rely on conjecture. It is well known, that foreign salted provisions are not often permitted to be used on board British ships of war. The supplies from this country for their ships are said to consist mostly of fresh provisions and breadstuffs. The former are supposed to have been obtained partly by force and partly by purchase. The quantities of either of these articles thus obtained are wholly uncertain. A person voluntarily furnishing supplies to the enemy, under certain circumstances, is guilty of treason; under any circumstances, he is guilty of a great misdemeanor, and liable to heavy penalties. While exposed to such perils, is it to be presumed that our citizens have furnished supplies in large quantities? That would be to suppose, not only the highest degree of depravity, but also a carelessness and negligence of self-preservation. If such crimes have been committed, why has not punishment followed? If the present laws will not restrain our citizens, what better hopes can be entertained from that now proposed? Suppose the bill to operate as favorably as its friends can expect, would it, in any considerable degree, produce the desired effects? While our seacoasts remain wholly unprotected, the hostile ships may always obtain by force a partial supply of vegetables and fresh provisions. Even breadstuffs may in that manner be obtained from certain parts of our coasts in considerable quantities. Nor can it be believed that this bill will entirely prevent all trade with the enemy's ships. Our prohibition of the exportation of flour and other produce, will, of course, greatly depress their prices at home. This will operate as a premium to supply the enemy in violation of the law. By our utmost exertions we shall not be able to prevent the hostile ships obtaining supplies, and partly from our shores. The most we can expect to do is, to enhance the prices at which they may be obtained. This will be more than balanced by lessening the number of ships which it will be necessary for the enemy to keep on our coast. A great portion of these are now employed in enforcing the blockade. Our embargo, together with a prohibition of importations, the other part of the system recommended by the President, strictly enforced, will completely effect the objects of the blockading squadrons; a few single ships will probably remain to take care that we faithfully execute our own laws, while the rest will be employed in predatory expeditions, or in other and more honorable service, in looking after our frigates. It is not probable, therefore, that the operation of the bill will even increase the expense to the enemy of maintaining on our coasts the ships necessary for his purpose. But suppose we should be able to do this to a certain degree. Suppose the enemy should find it necessary to keep the usual number of ships of war on our coast, and that we could increase the expense of the supplies of provisions now obtained from our shores to double the amount of their present prices. Would this induce him to withdraw his squadrons from our waters?

The annual expenditure of our enemy exceeds three hundred and fifty millions of dollars. With such means in her possession, will that proud and arrogant nation be influenced by your paltry calculations of the prices of provisions necessary for her fleets? We shall never be able to starve the hostile fleets from our waters.

To underrate the power and resources of our enemy is surely unwise. The wealth and naval resources of the British Empire have never been equalled by any nation, ancient or modern. Her possessions extend to every quarter of the globe. Having the dominion of the ocean, she has engrossed the commerce of the world. A nation so circumstanced cannot be starved, except by a general famine throughout the earth. Wheat grows in other countries besides our own.

It is time that we should seek instruction from experience. Our restrictive system, in its various forms and modifications, and enforced with all our power, was in operation several years. It was ostensibly designed, by operating on the interests of Great Britain, to induce her to respect our commercial rights. That it has failed to produce the desired effect, is sufficiently apparent from the fact, that we have since waged war against her to secure those rights. She has uniformly treated our system of commercial restrictions with utter contempt; she has not even condescended to retaliate. There can be no hopes, then, that this project, which was despised by Great Britain, when South America and the continent of Europe were shut against her trade, should, at the present time, when her commerce with those countries is more extensive than at any former period, produce the astonishing effect of disabling her to carry on the war. Let us cease flattering ourselves with such delusive prospects, which always have, and will continue to disappoint our expectations. We shall never produce any effect on our enemy by such expedients. They must be abandoned, and we must either make peace, or carry on the war, in which we are unfortunately engaged, in the old-fashioned way, by hard fighting. On the enemy, the proposed measure will, in my opinion, be inefficient. Would to God its operation on our own citizens may be equally harmless.

This bill prohibits exportations only, but it is understood that, in compliance with the recommendation of the President, it is to be followed by a prohibition of by far the greatest part of our customary importations. The intention, therefore, must be, during the continuance of the present war, to destroy all commerce. As nothing is to be exported, it requires no long course of reasoning to show that much cannot be imported. This plan certainly has all the recommendation of novelty. The history of the world does not produce an instance of a nation that has ever attempted it. It is a kind of self-immolation, like that practised by the inhabitants of Japan, who destroy themselves to resent an affront on their honor.

Nothing but the knowledge that this bill is patronised by men of high standing and reputation protects it from the accusation of extreme folly. Engaged in a war for the protection of your rights on the ocean, you abandon the ocean. Your enemy establishes a blockade of your coast, and you join with him and help to enforce it. There is nothing in issue between you. He wants to destroy your trade, and you accede to his wishes and abandon all trade. To secure your share of the empire of the sea, you compel your citizens to retire to the land. From this element, the only scene of your success, you have voluntarily withdrawn. For idle would be the attempt to establish and maintain a navy without commerce. No nation ever has or ever will effect it. France once had a navy; she still has ships; but the arbitrary power of her Emperor, exercising a military despotism over an immense population, is insufficient to man them. The fisheries and merchant service are indispensable nurseries of sailors for a navy. Already, according to the best information, has your system of commercial restrictions driven from their country one-third part of your mariners. This war, said to be commenced for sailors' rights, if much longer pursued on its present plan, will destroy its own object, for we shall have no sailors. Commercial and seafaring habits, once lost, cannot be soon regained.

Instead of your present mysterious policy, I advise to adopt that recommended by common sense. Having been injured on the ocean, there seek redress. Instead of wasting the lives of your citizens, and the treasures of your country, in a border warfare, in which you have no prospect of either honor or profit, provide a navy, and meet your enemy on the sea. There your brilliant success invites, and there the inclinations of your citizens will follow you. The nation will never believe that the real object of this war is the protection of commercial rights, while the tendency of your measures is to destroy commerce. Other evidence than mere declarations is necessary to establish the belief that you are friendly to a navy. The period of time elapsed since the declaration of war has been ample for building frigates and smaller vessels, and yet not a single vessel of war of any considerable force, built by your orders, floats on the sea. Your navy yards and magazines are known to be nearly destitute of materials necessary for building and equipping ships.

The destruction of commerce, and with it all hopes of a naval establishment, will be the consequence of passing this bill. Even the limited coasting trade and fisheries, on which vast numbers of our citizens depend for subsistence, cannot be pursued, except by the special favor and permission of the President. The inquiry into your right to do this is worthy of much consideration. Under what head in the charter of your powers is it contained? You have power to regulate commerce. Pass this bill, and there will be no commerce to regulate. This cannot be viewed as a temporary embargo. Although the operation of the act is limited to a period a little exceeding one year, yet the same policy which now enacts, will cause its continuance, at least during this war.

Is this right involved in the power to wage war? It will hardly be contended that such destruction of all commercial property and employments, is a necessary means of prosecuting the war. Humiliating must be the confession that the nation is already so pressed by the war as to render such an enormous sacrifice necessary. Is the justification of the measure to rest on that ground?

The hostile squadrons have undoubtedly obtained, by force, from our exposed coasts and islands, valuable supplies, contributing much to their comfort. Why, then, if you pretend to deal equal justice to all classes of your citizens, do you not prohibit the raising of wheat and other provisions in such exposed situations? Let the planters on the coasts, within the power of the enemy, retire into the interior of the country. Their distress would then be similar to what you are about to inflict on the commercial part of the nation. Common suffering would excite sympathy, which would tend to produce an united exertion for relief.

The loss of the revenue from importations and tonnage, now estimated at more than five millions of dollars annually, is the unavoidable consequence of the loss of trade. The specie will be drained from the country to pay for the foreign productions which will be introduced in defiance of the laws. When the want of market for the surplus produce shall have reduced the people to poverty, their distress will be heightened by the increase of taxes to support public credit, and to furnish the means to carry on the war.

There are consequences, of another cast, still more to be deprecated. The proposed measure tends to the destruction of the moral habits and character of the commercial class of society.

The time was, when the merchants of this country were deservedly praised for their strict and honorable observance of laws of trade and revenue. Prosecutions for the violations of those laws were unfrequent. In a free Government, laws calculated to promote the public welfare will in most cases be cheerfully obeyed. The bill before us contains all the offensive provisions of the former acts, introducing and enforcing the restrictive system. It is a melancholy fact, that more than three hundred prosecutions for violations of those acts were pending, at one time, in a single district. Those laws were generally esteemed by the commercial part of the community to be unjust and oppressive. They were consequently often violated. All manner of devices to evade them was invented and practised, and the trials of the prosecutions, which terminated mostly against the Government, show how difficult was the task of executing violent and arbitrary laws, counteracting the common sentiments of equity and justice.

The strength of a free Government consists essentially in the union of sentiment among its citizens. The act of the 9th of January, 1809, commonly called the enforcing act, in a short period after its enactment, and before any change had taken place in our foreign relations, was repealed. Certain provisions in that act, which are introduced into this bill, were deemed, by some of the wisest and best men in the nation, to infringe rights secured by the Constitution. You, Mr. President, can witness that many of the warmest friends of the Administration, at that time, thought that act could not be executed, except by military force.

Many of the details of the bill, liable to strong objections, apparently lose their importance when brought into comparison with the arbitrary and sanguinary means by which it is directed to be enforced. Power is given to the President of the United States, and such subordinate officers as he shall appoint, without the intervention of any civil magistrate, to call out and employ, at pleasure, all the military power of the nation. The exercise of such a power is not only contrary to the spirit of the Constitution, but utterly inconsistent with the principles of civil liberty. It is in effect declaring martial law throughout the country, and exposing every man's breast to the point of the bayonet. A people accustomed to live under the arbitrary exercise of such power, would soon become slaves. A Cæsar or Bonaparte would not be necessary; any demagogue might rob them of their liberties. When the altar is prepared, and the victim bound, a priest to officiate will not long be wanting.

A perseverance in arbitrary and oppressive measures will, in the end, alienate the affections of the people from the Government. Apprehensions are known to exist, that the unfortunate and disastrous state of our public affairs endangers the union of the States. I trust there is no cause at present to fear such a fatal calamity. The people of the Eastern States are supposed, by some, to view such an event with too much indifference. The accusation is unjust. A proposal to dissolve the Union would, at the present time, be there treated with universal abhorrence. That people will suffer long and severely before they resort to such desperate counsels. But the belief that foreign commerce is necessary for their prosperity and happiness, has descended to them from their ancestors. This belief is there embraced by all classes of society; is deeply rooted and thoroughly established. To secure that commerce was their chief inducement to associate under this Government. Whenever the people of those States shall have a settled conviction that it is the determined and unalterable policy of the Government to destroy their commerce, then will they disclaim all attachment to the Union, and attempt its dissolution. I do not say that the passing this bill will produce that conviction; but I do not hesitate to say that, in my opinion, such must and will be its tendency.

When Mr. MASON had concluded, the question was taken, Shall this bill pass as amended? and was determined in the affirmative—yeas 20, nays 14, as follows:

In appreciating the accepted proposal of the Government of Great Britain, for instituting negotiations for peace, Congress will not fail to keep in mind, that vigorous preparations for carrying on the war can in no respect impede the progress to a favorable result; whilst the relaxation of such preparations, should the wishes of the United States for a speedy restoration of the blessings of peace be disappointed, would necessarily have the most injurious consequences.

The Senate, resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to increase the bounty to be allowed persons who shall enlist in the Army of the United States, and to promote the recruiting service.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH rose, and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President—I would with pleasure obey the admonition of the honorable Senator from Georgia, (Mr. BIBB,) who has just taken his seat, if, after the bold discussion which this subject has undergone, I did not feel myself imperiously called on to justify the vote I shall give. His admonition comes too late; we have progressed beyond the point of return, and we stand pledged in the view of the nation to answer for our conduct.

The great latitude of remark which has been indulged in, and which the subject is so well calculated to suggest, must be my apology for any departure that I may make from the immediate point before us. I am fully aware of the wearied feelings of the Senate on this subject, which has been long under discussion, and I will relieve them as far as I can, by the assurance, that I shall confine myself to only one or two of the most prominent topics, in the remarks which I shall have the honor to make.

When my honorable friend from Rhode Island, (Mr. HUNTER,) in his eloquent observations on this point a few days ago, insisted upon a want of coincidence between the bill upon your table and the Presidential Message, a copy of a letter was introduced by the honorable Chairman of the Military Committee, (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL,) which we were told was to be considered as an official document, containing in itself the sentiments and opinions of the President, and transmitted authentically by him through the head of the War Department to the Chairman of the Military Committee of the House of Representatives. Under this assurance, this letter then becomes an important document, and relying upon the manner in which it is presented to us, I shall treat it with all that deference and respect which a paper of such high descent is so eminently entitled to.

This letter, sir, is written upon the subject of the recruiting service, and recommends two plans to be pursued to procure soldiers, either of which, in the opinion of the Administration, might be well adopted by the committee. The first of these plans is a classification of the militia, compelling each class to furnish a soldier during the war—which is no more nor less than a perfect and actual conscription—and a preference for this mode is expressed in the letter. The second plan is, to recruit soldiers by voluntary enlistments, by tempting them with very high bounties; and the last is the mode adopted by the committee in the bill before us. And here, sir, I take occasion to thank that honorable committee for the fortunate selection they have made from the two alternatives submitted to them. For, objectionable as I consider the plan before us, in consequence of the exorbitancy of the bounty, yet the rights of the citizens are not infringed by it—the freedom of the country is not endangered. But, if that hideous system of conscription had been resorted to, the result would have been fatal; and the germ of despotism thus planted in our land would soon have eradicated every fibre of our liberties.

If we contrast the bounty proposed to be given by this bill, with that which has formerly been given, we shall be astonished at the great disparity between them. Hitherto the men enlisted, for five years or during the war, have had sixteen dollars bounty and one hundred and sixty acres of land. Those who enlisted for twelve or eighteen months, had the sixteen dollars without the land—and the last year an act of Congress gave those who enlisted for five years, or during the war, the increased advantage of three months pay in advance, which amounted to twenty-four dollars in addition to the former sixteen. If we extend our view further, the contrast will be more striking. In Great Britain, the country of our enemy, the usual bounty is about a guinea a man, and on the continent of Europe it does not exceed two dollars; whilst we are giving from one hundred to one hundred and twenty dollars bounty, eight dollars extra fee, and a total exemption from militia duty to any one who will procure a recruit; with from one hundred and sixty to three hundred and twenty acres of land at the end of the service. What nation can stand under such extravagance as this? What country can possibly carry on an efficient warfare for any time upon such terms?

If, sir, it could have been thought safe to have intrusted the Senate of the United States with specific statements, distinguishing what forces were necessary for defence, what for the navy, and what for the conquest of Canada, much money might have been saved to the nation, and much time and anxiety to this House. For the two first objects, no increase of bounty would have been necessary. On the subject of defence there is but one sentiment in this Senate, or in the nation. Whatever may be our opinion of the war, however disastrously and unwisely we may have been led into it, we are always ready to defend our country at every hazard; for this object we are prepared to pledge the wealth and strength of the nation. And as for the navy, sir, that last surviving shoot from the ancient stock, the venerated relic of better days, that has defied the blasts of political revolution, we will nurture it with a kinsman's love, and with a father's pride. Handed down to us from those whose principles we cherish, we will always show towards it a munificence correspondent to its glory. But as for the conquest of Canada, I will not hazard a prediction what bounty may be necessary to raise an army sufficient for that object; nor am I to be considered as one of those gentlemen who have protruded their advice to the Administration to withdraw their troops from that country. The advice would be unnecessary, even if it was given; as I believe, sir, you have not a man beyond the lines at this time. Opposed as I am to this war, upon every consideration blended with the prosperity of the nation, I shall certainly not intermeddle with its destination. It is enough for me to be prepared, at all times, for effectual and ample defence, to sustain my opinions against the policy and prospects of this war, and to leave the responsibility of conducting it upon those who have so ardently and so manfully shouldered it.

But, sir, there is a consideration which may not be altogether unworthy of attention; how far this extravagant use of the public money in raising an army may have a prejudicial effect upon your navy. If we give this enormous bounty for the land service, will it not be just, as well as necessary, to give a corresponding bounty for the sea service? Or will you exalt the one and depress the other? Will you depress that service which, when the honor of the nation languished on the shore, bore it in triumph o'er the main, unsullied by reproach, and on which you must ultimately depend, when a better policy bears sway, efficiently to contend with every foreign foe? I hope not, sir. If you should increase the bounty now contemplated it will be irrevocably fixed; you can never diminish it; you can never expect again to enlist another soldier for a less premium. You will then, sir, have the further difficulty of adjusting so prodigal an expenditure of the public money, to the necessities of a Treasury filled exclusively by loans and taxes. I well remember the sentiment of the honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. BLEDSOE,) who said that, when the national rights were in contest, he would not count the cost. Sir, I honor the feelings that dictate such a sentiment, and the only reply I can make to it is, that statesmen must calculate as well as feel.

The honorable chairman of the committee (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL) has attempted to prove an inconsistency in those who, professing to advocate the war, refuse to grant means to carry it on. He was right, sir; the inconsistency is as great and as glaring, as if those who are opposed to the war in principle should endeavor to perpetuate it. For my own part, I have always been opposed to it from a sense of duty to the best interests of my country, and, for this reason, I voted against the taxes of the former session. But, sir, a maxim has been laid down which is calculated to mislead the public opinion, to wit: "That being now actually engaged in war, all persons should join in it to carry it on." This position is founded in error, and leads to consequences destructive to public liberty and personal rights. Can it be supposed that we, who have opposed this war from the beginning, as wrong in conception, wrong in progress, ruinous in its tendency, and incompetent to its object, can give it our support? Can it be expected that we shall approve, by our votes, what our best judgment most honestly condemns? This would be faithless to our duty, and treacherous to those who have confided in us.

Besides, sir, you do not want our aid; it is not necessary for a single purpose towards this war. The President himself is the father and patron of this war; he has had, from its commencement, a large majority in both Houses of Congress who have agreed with him in opinion, and who have been disposed to favor his views. If, then, it was proper that the war should have been vigorously waged, I demand why has not this been done? Why has he not come forward with the boldness of a statesman, and the frankness of a soldier, and told you what was necessary for his purpose? The friends of the war have had, and still have, all power in the nation; all the resources of the country are at their command and subject to their control. If, sir, it was proper to declare this war, it was proper to carry it on with energy and with vigor; and if the President thought that the honor and the welfare of the country required the war, he should have breasted the shock, and staked his crown and sceptre upon the issue. If he has not done so, he has flinched from his duty, and the dishonor must attach where the power existed, and where the exercise of that power has been abandoned. This call, then, upon the opposition for their co-operation, however intended, can only be considered as working a diversion of popular attention. You do not require their aid to enable you to command the national resources, and if you cannot withstand their remonstrance, your cause is not good. Put the case, then, ingenuously to the nation. If you mean war, draw forth the necessary means for your purpose, and revive the drooping glory of the country. If you carry us well through, and obtain the avowed object you aim at, we will hail you as our deliverer, and the honors and the affections of the nation shall be your reward. But if you shrink from this duty, we shall prove you to have been recreant; and if you fail in or stop short of your project, you must expect to meet the indignation of the people.

But, sir, this position, "that all are bound to support the war because it is declared," is a doctrine teeming with mischief; it is a doctrine behind which a corrupt Administration (whenever such a one shall exist) will entrench itself and defy your utmost efforts. When an Administration shall be crumbling into ruins by its own corruption, you say to it, bring about a declaration of war by any means, and you are secure. Thus the tottering edifice is saved from the tempest of public opinion, and the worst of crimes finds shelter in the production of the greatest national calamities. Besides, sir, this call upon the Opposition is to demand a surrender of their rights; it has an ungenerous influence to stifle the freedom of debate. Possessed of no power and no control in the national affairs, we have nothing left us but the freedom of opinion and the right of utterance; and believe me, sir, we are little known if it can be supposed that we will surrender, in our own persons, those dearest rights of citizens; those noblest privileges of the Constitution.

But, sir, indulge me with asking gentlemen what event has taken place in the progress of this war that is calculated to change our opinions or to conciliate our favor? Thousands of lives have been sacrificed, thousands of your citizens have been made captives; nearly one hundred millions of dollars have been expended, about forty millions of which is a new public debt, to which we are now called on to add thirty millions more by loans for the current year. The temporary hold you had in Canada has been wrested from you; you have been driven and pursued within your own lines, while conflagration and carnage have marked the progress of the enemy. The descent upon Montreal—that mighty project—concentrating in itself all the talents, and energy, and skill, of the Administration, has proved an abortion, and we now dread the arrival of every mail, lest it may bring the unwelcome tidings of the capture of our armies, or the destruction of our Lake fleet. Is there anything in all this, sir, to attach us to the war; to make us approve its utility; to render us partial to its progress? Are we still to be called on to vote armies and to give hundreds of dollars for men to be tomahawked by Indians, and no inquiries made into the causes of our disasters, no account taken of these dreadful calamities? It is truly an unpleasant task to trace the alarming secret, yet trace it when you will, you will find it no partial defect. Sir, you commenced wrong at first. Instead of having a grand army organized, military stores and magazines prepared, the most important points of your country fortified, and your Treasury ample for your purpose, you plunged into the war without a soldier, a dollar, or a General. Defeat and disaster followed of course, and, in a moment of desperation, when one portion of your citizens are disgusted with the war, another portion dismayed by your defeats, and all humiliated with mortification, you are induced to offer exorbitant bounties for recruits to fill up ranks that never were filled before, and to supply the places of those who have fallen the wretched victims to your improvidence and rashness.

The honorable chairman (Mr. G. W. CAMPBELL) has ascribed the origin of this war to the Opposition, alleging that Great Britain has always excited divisions among her enemies, and that she has spoken of her friends here. Were it not, sir, for the usual accuracy of that honorable gentleman, I should have been led to believe that he had taken a French maxim for a British custom. To divide and conquer is a French doctrine, on which they have always practised, and, since the war of the late Revolution, with no inconsiderable success. How far Great Britain may be disposed to adopt a similar plan I cannot determine.

When the gentleman talks of the British Minister speaking of his friends here, I presume he alludes to that celebrated letter of Mr. Russell, in which my Lord Castlereagh is made to mention, "our friends in Congress," and Mr. Russell to stare. Before I can admit this document in evidence, I will sketch its origin and progress as handed down to us. This letter purports to bear date in London, on the 17th of September, 1812, and was presented by Mr. Russell himself, in Washington, to the Secretary of State, on the 16th of November following, accompanied by a note having reference to another letter in London, two days after, the 19th of September, in the postscript of which, mention is said to have been made of this letter, but which postscript was not to be found in the letter, it being stated to have been omitted for want of sufficient time. This letter, then, although written on the 17th of September, was omitted to be sent with the letter of the 19th following, but is said to have been mentioned in its postscript; which postscript has no existence. It was also neglected to be sent with another letter of subsequent date, the 7th of November, from the Narrows, near New York. Now, sir, although I have good authority to believe that a letter something like the one of September the 17th, was seen on the post road near Havrede-Grace, in possession of Mr. Russell, when on his way to Washington; yet, from the slow progress of this letter to its destination, seeing that those of subsequent dates had been forwarded and received, I hope I shall not be accused of a strained or uncharitable construction, if I infer that its exquisite touches and fashion were reserved to be finished here. These circumstances maturely weighed and taken into consideration, with the lapse of the intervening time, impair my faith in the accuracy of the recital of the conversation it purposes to give, and I must, on this ground, except to the testimony adduced in support of the position; and will leave Mr. Russell to adjust the delicate point of diplomacy yet unsettled between himself and his Excellency the Duke of Bassano.

The honorable gentleman from Tennessee has also said impressments, and not the Orders in Council, were the chief causes of war. So far as this may be considered the influence that operated upon the gentleman's own mind, I am willing to take his opinions from his own lips; but so far as this may be considered the sentiment of the Administration, I can turn to documents now in the Senate to prove that the reverse is the fact, viz: That the Orders were considered, not only the chief cause of contest with Great Britain, but that the subject of impressment was totally disregarded, untouched, and unthought of. I refer you, sir, to the negotiation with Mr. Erskine, in 1809, in which the Orders in Council and our interdictory laws constituted the sole questions of adjustment; and when a state of amity and friendly intercourse was agreed on, by our Administration and the British Minister, without ever mentioning one single word upon the subject of impressment. This goes, then, incontestably to prove that the affair of impressment was not estimated by the present Administration as an obstacle at all to a good understanding between the two countries; much less can it now be relied on by them as the exclusive ground of war.

I can never sufficiently deplore the first great error which was committed in declining to close our misunderstandings with Great Britain by the rejection of the Treaty of 1806. The letter which was read to you yesterday by the honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BRENN) on another occasion, written by the present Secretary of State to this Government, illustrating his views and convictions on the Treaty of 1806, revived the subject in my mind. When I reflect, sir, upon the soundness of the argument, and the able, as well as ample exposition there made use of to recommend that treaty, I have always been astonished how it could have been rejected. Still greater was my surprise to find that, after such grounds of compromise could be attained, we should be plunged into a war. And most of all, sir, that the author of that letter should be numbered amongst the most strenuous advocates and abettors of that war.

There are few persons who have greater reason to deprecate the present state of things than myself. Exclusive of that love of country which we all feel, there are other reasons which produce no ordinary degree of sensation in my mind. The country from which I come is one of the most exposed and defenceless parts of the Union, and has already suffered much from the destructive ravages of the enemy. During the first season they took possession of a large section of our territory, and made incursions with a powerful force into other parts. Incapable of successful resistance, with our own means, against such an invasion, we had before stated our helpless condition, and supplicated the aid of the General Government. This was denied us, and, as if our sufferings were not sufficient, we were sarcastically told, in reply to our petition, that we could not obtain any aid because we were exposed at so many points. Thus abandoned to our fate, we summoned up our little forces, though weak in arms, yet strong in valor, and resolved in the last resort to hazard everything in defence of our families and homes. Fortunately the contest did not come on. Sir, I wish I had the means of recommending the unfortunate situation of my fellow-citizens to the protecting care of their Government. I wish I could make known the necessity in a strain that would command relief. Sir, these people desire better things—they are a native population, growing out of the soil they inhabit; consisting chiefly of agriculturists and mechanics, who are devoted to their Government and country. Bearing in common with their brethren the burden of society, they consider themselves entitled to a fair participation in its benefits—they ask no more, and this they have a just right to claim, under the sanction of that Constitution which orders a provision for “the common defence and general welfare.” When to these reflections I add, sir, the anticipation of that horrid and bloody system of retaliation which is threatened to be executed, and remember that the land that is inhabited by my friends, and relations and neighbors, from its exposed situation, will be a ready theatre for the exhibition of this tragic scene, I am filled with forebodings to which I can give no utterance, and am left to the distressing anticipation that upon the approaching season my native country may become an extended plain of ashes slaked with human blood.

But, sir, I will desist—and if I have been betrayed into any excess of feeling by the events to which I have alluded, I hope I shall be pardoned in the consideration of the deep interest I have in them.

Mr. WELLS rose and addressed the Chair, as follows:

Mr. President, the bill before us is for filling up the present establishment of the army; and proposes to effect this purpose, by giving a very extraordinary bounty to each recruit hereafter entering the service.

I am at a loss to determine by what rule any of the bounties, which have been talked of upon this occasion, have been governed. None of them bear any reasonable proportion to the sum allowed at present by law. The bounty established by law is only sixteen dollars. Nominally it is more; but the excess is only an advance of pay. The proposed bounties go still farther beyond what is usually allowed for this purpose in other countries.

A bounty in land is liable, in my mind, to two objections. It will create a fund for speculation; and, taking up a good deal of the labor of the country, will transfer a larger part of it, at the conclusion of the war, to the Western States. At the end of the war, I could wish to see our laborers, who are temporarily detached from us, returned to the districts from which they were drawn. And besides, if the object be simply to fill up the army, and is unconnected, as I am bound to presume it is, with any favorite local policies, which can only be promoted at the expense of particular interests, the surest way to obtain your soldiers is to pay them down at once the bounty they are to have. You would get their service, in this way, at a fairer and cheaper rate to the public than in any other.

I do not mean, however, to say, when I am objecting to the enormity of the proposed gratuities, that some increase of the present established bounty is not necessary. A state of things, in this country, is brought about, which ought to have been within the foresight of those who precipitated us into this war. It is certainly true, as has been well observed, that a population thinly spread over a great expanse of country, accustomed to convenient interchanges by water, requiring but little labor to transport its heaviest products, is suddenly obliged to transfer this operation to land conveyance; which, of course, has absorbed, if I may be allowed the term, much of the labor of the country. It is equally true, that the almost total exclusion of foreign merchandise from our markets, by occasioning an extensive demand for our own manufactures, has produced an additional absorption of labor. From the remaining stock of labor the supplies for your army are to be drawn after the other concerns of this country are provided for.

That by these competitions the difficulty of enlisting your army is, in no small degree increased, I am willing to admit. But I am far from being prepared to say, that the inefficiency of this country for war is such as to justify the prescription of such bounties as are now proposed to be given. Much, however, perhaps everything material in relation to this subject of bounty, depends upon the kind of war you wage. It is the first inquiry, sir, the recruit will make of you—and, according to the answer you give him, will be the price he will ask you—“Am I to march to Canada?” If you tell him that there the service is to be performed which you require of him, if he does not turn his heel upon you, he will ask you fully the price now proposed to be given to him. But ask him what bounty he will take to fight for his parents, for his sisters, for his wife, and his children—to meet the invading foe, and repel him from his country; talk to him in this way, make an appeal of this kind to him, and he will be yours without very high bribing.

No, sir, it is not for this kind of war your soldier is to be enlisted. Not his own, but a foreign country is to be the theatre of his glory. Canada is to be that theatre. There the war is to be waged by us, and not here. The bounty proves it. The price you offer shows what you want. If we establish then this bounty, we do virtually approve of, we do advise the war in Canada. I cannot approve of that war; I cannot advise its prosecution there. I, therefore, cannot vote for these bounties.

Our right to inquire into, or in any shape interfere with, the application of the public force, has been questioned. It seems to be considered as our province only to prepare the power, and the President's to apply it; and that we are bound to give nerve and vigor to his arm, let it fall where it may.

The provision in the Constitution which, in a wise and wholesome spirit of caution and distrust, limits to a period of two years the power over appropriations for the support of armies, anticipates, among other things, the fluctuation of public opinion, which may place in either House of the National Legislature a majority of members opposed to the further prosecution of an existing war. I think I am warranted in saying that a sound construction of this provision, taken in connexion with other parts of the Constitution, equally with the nature and genius of our Government, will justify the withholding of supplies for military purposes, where either the continuance of the war itself, or the direction in which it is moving, is disapproved of by those who are called upon to vote for those supplies. To me it is clear that we have a volition upon this point; that we are now authorized to make this inquiry, and are competent to proportioning our supplies of men and money to the objects which we think ought to be those of the war, in the present juncture of our affairs.

We have been pleasantly told that we are imitating the example of the foolish man who stole his own oats from his own horse. No, sir; are we rather not like the prudent master, who is giving to his horse as much, and no more oats than are proper for him to have? This salutary caution and distrust, resulting from the known fallibility of our nature, compose the very basis upon which our Government rests. It is a Government of checks; and the power to give, implying the power to withhold, is one of them.

What is the state of the case upon which we are called to act? We are engaged in war, and, being in war, it is insisted that it is the duty of the minority to support the war. For one, sir, I am free to say that I am willing to vote for what I consider the proper, and, in our present situation, the only efficient support of this war.

I may be allowed to observe, with my honorable friend near me, that I by no means love this war. I think we have been very unfortunately, and very unnecessarily, precipitated into it. But we are in war; and if I can agree with gentlemen in what is the proper support of it, they shall have my vote for any amount of money, and any number of men.

The case, perhaps, does not now exist, where it would be proper and necessary to withhold supplies altogether to oblige the President to make peace. The late and important change in the affairs of Europe; the disasters which have befallen us in this war; the consequences which are daily and hourly developing themselves, of hurrying into hostilities without due preparation to sustain them; these, and numerous other important considerations must, at this season, weigh conclusively with the President in favor of peace. I am obliged, therefore, to believe that he is now desirous—sincerely desirous—of getting us as speedily as possible out of the unhappy war, into which he has so recently advised us to enter.

It is, to be sure, no war of ours. We advised, we cautioned, we conjured gentlemen not to enter into it. We entreated them not to precipitate themselves into these difficulties. We begged them to pause but a few months. They were told, again and again, if the Orders in Council are the causes of war, wait only a little moment, and they will be removed out of your way. Your restrictive measures, in which the country has been so long persuaded to acquiesce, if you will have but a little patience, will insure to your predictions the triumph of appearing to have effected the object to which they were professed to have been adopted. No, sir, nothing that could render this war worse than useless for its avowed objects, could arrest its headlong course. It had scarcely been declared, when its folly, and the provident foresight of those who had opposed its adoption, became apparent to the people. It was soon seen that there had been, if I may be allowed the figure, a well-contested race between the declaration of war, on the one hand, and the repeal of the Orders in Council, on the other. The war distanced the orders by a few days.

Now, sir, we are told, that although the Orders in Council are repealed, they are not the only causes of war. Until the main cause of the war was entirely removed, we never heard the subjects which have been lately clustered together as auxiliary causes of war, insisted upon as sufficient to justify a resort to war. They were never placed, that I remember, by any department of our Government, in that light before the people. They were not considered as such by Congress; nor did the President, until recently, regard them as being of that character. In the arrangement he made with Mr. Erskine, the subject of impressment is not mentioned. Our laws have been considered as referring exclusively to the Orders in Council as the cause which had interrupted the good understanding between the two countries; and make their annulment sufficient for the restoration of that good understanding. In the treaty negotiated with Great Britain, by Messrs. Monroe and Pinkney, no notice is taken of the subject of impressment. It was left under the control of an informal arrangement; manifesting, as those gentlemen believed, a sincere disposition, and real determination, on the part of the British Government, to prevent our having any future cause of complaint on that head.

We are then virtually at war, without any cause of war. That this may, with great truth, be said to be the real state of the case, I think any of the honest yeomen of this country whom we meet on the road, could easily convince us. They do not know for what we are at war.

JANUARY, 1814.

So that instead of a cause of war, to the people plain, open, evident and palpable, we resort to ingenuity and sophistry for colorings, for mere pretences of war.

Yet still the question presses us. We are at war. Shall we submit—shall we let the enemy injure us, and we not annoy him? No, sir, not so. To my mind, our cause is a clear one.

The cause for which you went to war is removed. You are about negotiating peace. Act then, in the interim, upon the defensive, and not upon the offensive. Shove aside the project of invading Canada. Avow your present object to be the defence of your own country; and until you have provided effectual defence, you will not renew the war of invasion. Let this be your policy, and I will agree with gentlemen, that the people will have cause to complain of us, if we refuse you our votes for either money or men.

What will you do with Canada, if you succeed in its conquest? I have heard it, at one time said, that we were to take it, to have it in hand to exchange for New York. To my mind, the plainer and more obvious course is, to provide for the effectual defence of New York—as well as to take care of our other cities;—in fact, to defend what we have already got, before we attempt to annoy what belongs to the enemy.

But is this really the plan? Is all this parade of war for the conquest of Canada, only that it may be afterwards quietly given up again? Is it for an object of this sort, that this monstrous bounty is to be paid? Is it for this we are mortgaging our resources—that we are running into debt faster, in proportion to our means, than any nation on the face of the earth ever did before us? Is it for this, all our favorite plans of economy are thrown aside? Is it for this we are leaving our own country defenceless at home? Are we making sacrifices of this kind, in the fruitless endeavor to obtain our object, which we have predetermined to relinquish, almost as soon as we have attained it?

Perhaps, having got Canada, I may be told that it is intended to hold it—that we are not making this effort for nothing; that, if we conquer that country, it is permanently to change masters. If this be the plan, it may be of some service to inquire what effect our policy thus disclosed will have upon the negotiation into which we are about to enter.

Peace we all profess to have in view. Will this sort of war promote that object? Without preparation of any kind we have hurried into war with an enemy fully equipped and ready to meet us. We are unable to escape the natural consequences of heedless, headlong policy. Disaster and disgrace attend its footsteps. Yet still we persevere in our original scheme. Canada is still the fond object of our wishes. Foiled in our first and second efforts, we are straining every nerve to be more successful in the next. Sir, even those who are only fitted for the rank and file of our army feel that we are wrong. We ourselves are conscious of their reluctance to the service; and we are preparing excitements for their cupidity, which shall overcome their sense of justice and love of country.

Will this course incline our enemy to peace? She is our neighbor by land. She has important fisheries near us. Her West Indian colonies are not far from us. We are a young and thriving people. Our extent of country is immense. Our population is rapidly increasing. Our agricultural, our commercial, and our manufacturing interests are magnifying themselves beyond all precedent. These resources allowed time, in their own way, to unfold and spread themselves, will, before many years, make us a great and powerful nation. With an increasing ability to do harm or good, will it stand us instead to make other nations believe that we are about to surrender ourselves up to the lust of foreign conquest? Has not our enemy already too much reason to apprehend, while we are endeavoring to grasp with one hand the territories to the North of us, that the other is itching to seize those to the South?

Will it be wise in us to afford her cause for apprehending that we are entertaining a gigantic policy—that we are yielding to a colossal covetousness, which invites us to look to the Pacific ocean for our Western boundary, and to the Isthmus of Darien for the centre of our empire?

If such should be the estimate of our ambition by our enemy, will he be inclined to listen to peace? Will he not rather be disposed to improve the opportunity our improvidence has afforded him? He has caught us at fault. He is prepared for the war, and we are not. We ourselves do not want to lose the present moment. We are to seize Canada, and we mean, as some have urged, to hold it for the peace and security of our frontiers. While we are indulging ourselves in ambitious schemes of this kind, it would be well for us to remember that it is quite possible our enemy may think it for his interest, that he may deem it essential for the safety of his important possessions, and those of his allies in our neighborhood, to improve this war, to the wasting of our resources for mischief to himself and others. He may resolve to annihilate our commerce, to destroy our fisheries, lay waste our seacoast, and encumber us with an immense debt. And all this will cost him not much effort or expense to accomplish. Our safety, we say, requires him to yield up some of his possessions. His safety, he may think, requires us on our part to submit to still greater sacrifices. The retaliating policy which has been lately developing itself, means more, I fear, than meets the eye. It is much to be apprehended that it has its strongest root in this national jealousy, and anticipates results not unlike some of those that are here referred to.

Change then, without delay, the nature of this war. Abandon the project upon Canada. Her inhabitants are our neighbors—our friends—our relations. It is an unnatural war, and most unnaturally has it been waged. All the success there we hoped for, had it been ours, would have been insufficient to remove from our national character a stain which a single, unhappy, cruel event of that war has brought upon it. What our enemy has done to us of this kind, instead of enkindling in our bosoms an ardent, honest indignation, must henceforth serve only to bring us to the recollection of our own shame and dishonor.

It is here I differ with the friends of this Canadian war. Let the public force be applied to the real maintenance of the public interest, and my vote shall not attempt to weaken it. Far, very far, is it from being, in my poor humble judgment, a proper and justifiable direction of the public force, which leaves our own country without defence—more especially at a moment like this, when the enemy, possessed of ample means, seems meditating against us a war of extermination.

Honorable gentlemen inquire of us what sort of war is this, that is to be a war of defence only, and not a war of offence? An inversion of the argument, sir, would be its proper answer. We therefore ask, on our part, what sort of a war is this, which is to be a war of offence, and not of defence? Is it not a fact, that the war, on our part, has assumed this complexion? It is, indeed, a war of offence only nominally, except against ourselves; and much as we need defence, it is no war of defence. It makes vain and fruitless efforts to annoy our enemy abroad, and leaves us at home undefended—unprotected—at his mercy.

The course we contend for is a different one. We desire to see the defence of the country, in the first place, provided for to the utmost of our means. Let us station our soldiers at central points, from which they can easily be marched to the places of attack, in aid of the militia. Let us distribute muskets and all necessary equipments, and ammunition, to the militia. Let us strengthen the defences of our large and opulent cities. Let us build vessels for the protection of our rivers; and let us set ourselves in earnest about the foundation of a navy, such as this country ought to have, and is amply able to maintain. Let some of the countless millions of expense be set aside for these purposes, and not all thrown away upon wild projects of foreign conquest. Let not the blood of our soldiers be shed merely to crimson the snows of Canada. If it must flow, let it flow freely, with that of our own, in defence of what is worth its price—our altars and our firesides. We envy not our neighbors their possessions; we are content with our own homes, and deem them well worthy of being defended.

It is, indeed, Mr. President, high time for us to be thinking of this first and most important application of the public force. We owe it to no exertions of our own, that our homes are not at this moment the scenes of violation. Fortunately for us, nature has stepped in to our succor. Winter fights upon our side, and holds over us her impenetrable shield. The revolution of the seasons will soon detach from us this potent ally, when we must depend for our defence upon our own efforts.

Sir, is it at this moment within the power of this young nation, suddenly and unpreparedly thrust into war with such a foe as Britain, to defend itself effectually at home, and to carry on, at the same time, extensive military operations abroad? That there is too much occasion for making this inquiry, I think, is demonstrated by the events of the two last campaigns—by the declarations and conduct of the Government itself, in respect to the defence of our States—by the existing condition of the army—and by the anticipated difficulties of filling it up. There is left us, then, only the choice of two alternatives—an offensive or a defensive war. We who live on the seaboard had flattered ourselves that the twelve-months men were designed to act in our defence. The State from which I come furnished her quota of that force, in the fullest confidence that it was to co-operate with her militia to repel invasions. She has since seen those men marched away, and some of them, I am told, in chains, destined for foreign service.

In the course of debate, upon this occasion, reference has been made to party spirit, and to the divisions which exist among the people in relation to this war. It has been said that the enemy relies upon these divisions for weakening and paralyzing our exertions.

Sir, it would have been well for us, if, before we precipitated ourselves into this war, we had sufficiently reflected upon the nature of our Government, and had been perfectly assured that public opinion would for any length of time bear us out, and support us in the dreadful appeal we were about to make. The difficulty of successfully prosecuting the military operations in a free Government, where the right to think and the right to express opinions in respect to public men and public measures have been expressly retained by the people, as two of their most inestimable privileges, affords to humanity the best and strongest security that war will not be by such Governments wantonly waged, or unnecessarily persevered in. Gentlemen should remember, besides, that it has been precisely to the same principles of freedom, preserved to the people of Great Britain by their Government, that all the measures of our restrictive policy have professed to address themselves. These principles are as closely inherent in their Government as in ours; and whenever the people of either country become adverse to an existing war, there must be an end of it.

If even those of us who are opposed to this war were to acquiesce, in silent submission, to the measures of the Administration; if our lips were sealed; if we suffered, amidst all the evils of this war, not a murmur nor a complaint to escape us; still our enemy would make the same calculation upon the progress of public opinion that she now does. She is sufficiently acquainted with the state of things here—with our pursuits and our habits and our resources—to anticipate without much difficulty, and without any commentaries of ours, the natural progress of this war, and its unavoidable operation upon our best and most important interests. She knows what France has inflicted upon this country, and the indignant sense which the mind of every honest American entertains of the outrages she has committed against us. Ignorant, indeed, must she be of the true character of the people of this country, if she believes it would long afford them satisfaction to array themselves, with the French Emperor, against the liberties of the world. Such, indeed, virtually, is the effect—I will not say the object—of our hostilities with Britain.

A remark which fell from my honorable friend near me, in respect to Great Britain, has given rise to a pretty sharp philippic against the Government of that country; which has been represented as occasioning the overthrow and destruction of every ally with whom it has been connected. Among other instances, we have been reminded of the ravages and massacres in Scotland. I do not know, sir, that glowing descriptions of this kind, considering the high authority from which they proceed, are much calculated, just at this moment, to facilitate to us the attainment of peace. They are unfortunate, too, in another respect. They are too well adapted to make pass in review before us, what has lately befallen our own character, in the progress of our armies in Canada. When we were referred to Scotland particularly, as the theatre of British perfidy and inhumanity, it brought to my recollection the account given in history of the ravages and massacre in the valley of Glencoe; certainly one of the most flagrant and atrocious of the wrongs committed by Britain on that country. Let us, for a moment, if we can venture to do so, turn our eyes to the points of resemblance between that horrid and barbarous transaction, which took place many years back, and what has happened, in the course of the present Winter, in Canada. Into the valley of Glencoe, the residence of a Scottish chieftain, of the name of McDonald, and his numerous clan, the British troops entered, they said, as friends to its inhabitants. So did ours into Canada. It was midnight, and its peaceful tenants wrapped in sleep, when the work of destruction commenced at Glencoe. The same at Newark. It was in the depth of winter, and the ground covered with snow. Just so at Newark. The British officer had orders in his pocket for what he did. Our officer says he had orders for what he did. The British Government disavowed the authority. So, I am bound to presume in this case, does ours. The British officer was not punished. The American officer is not punished.

It would have been a wise course in us, sir, if, instead of following the bad examples of our enemy, we had profited by his good examples. Whatever have been the faults of Britain—even if we should think that the very evils which humanity has suffered for many years past, have eventuated from that folly in Britain, to which we were indebted for our independence—yet still we ought to do her justice when we behold her making such ample retribution. If from her short-sighted and avaricious policy, which occasioned her the loss of this country, resulted the present state of Europe—it is to her wisdom, to her perseverance and valor, that the civilized world, at this moment, stands indebted for its liberties. To that nation oppressed humanity everywhere turns her eye. Portugal and Spain hail her as their deliverer. What have we to say of ourselves in respect to Spain and Portugal? Have we, who ought to know how to feel for nations oppressed—have we sympathized with those heroic, those gallant people in their struggle for independence? Have we triumphed at their emancipation, or even acknowledged it? Have we, in the eventful crisis of the times, any way acquitted ourselves of the debt we owed to humanity? Have we not rather been disposed to profit of the opportunity of virtue and valor in distress, to turn a longing eye towards the spoils we might seize? Yes, sir; Portugal, and Spain, and Germany, and Russia, and Sweden, and Prussia, all hail our enemy with one voice as their deliverer. Holland, and Italy, and Switzerland, look to her for succor. Joy and gratitude spring up in the bosom of even the tyrant's own family. Nay, France herself, if she dared to speak, would join the loudest in the general thanksgiving. Yes, sir, and the very gentlemen here, who carry on the war so furiously against this same Britain, are themselves thankful that she stood in the breach, and made a rampart for them. This, then, was not a time to choose to go to war with her. She was struggling for the liberties of mankind, against the enemy of mankind. The liberty of the world was at stake. It was not a time to higggle about our matters with her; and, beside, we had an account ourselves with her enemy, that called, loudly called for settlement. In such a moment—indeed at any time, was it fit, was it suitable for this nation to become a friend, a co-operator, an ally with France? With France, who has never deigned to talk to us but in the language of insult and opprobrium—who has made treaties with us only to violate them—who with outstretched arms has invited our commerce to her harbors, merely to plunder or destroy it—who has insulted us with her love, while she was everywhere burning and sinking our ships—whose every form of Government tramples us under foot—whose republic chastised us with whips—whose monarchy chastised us with scorpions?

Mr. President, in the course of the debate we have been triumphantly challenged to name a single nation besides Britain that claims a right to seize her subjects on board foreign vessels at sea. Without going at this time into any general examination of the subject of impressment, I beg leave, sir, to refer you to France, and her conduct towards us, where you will find a precedent for every outrage. We say distinctly that France claims and exercises this right. It is, and long has been, the fixed, permanent, and immutable law of her empire. I have the evidence on my desk before me, if it is desired. The report upon our tables proves her practice under this law. Indeed, her violence and rapine consider discrimination as out of character. She sinks or burns whole ships and cargoes, and seizes whole crews. When it suits her, she consigns those crews to dungeons, or marches them in chains, like slaves, immediately under the eye of her sovereign, through her land. The language our sailors speak leads her into no error with respect to the country to which they belong. Her prisoners—the subjects of her enemy—Englishmen—they receive not at her hands such treatment. It is a cruel and barbarous distinction, which she prides herself in keeping in store only for those whom she loves—for those whom she insultingly calls her friends! With respect to her own subjects she acknowledges no principle of expatriation, regards no naturalization; and, that on this head we may have no lurking-place for affectation or ignorance, she tells us, in so many words, to our very face, that she claims the right to recover her subjects, whether naturalized or not, and even without demanding them. Nor does she exercise this right at sea only, but enters our harbors and seizes and carries her sailors off by force, and without our permission; even, sir, from our very towns. Indeed, Mr. President, there is something in the mass and enormity of French outrage towards this country which goes beyond all power of description in language, and transcends all power of passion in nature. Had the inflictions of France been less, had they been somewhat minute and particular, our indignation might have kept them pace; but they have exceeded the point at which feeling ceases, and beyond which resentment never reaches.

To conclude—the consciousness that the people of the United States have of all these matters; of the situation in which Britain is at this moment placed; of the imminent danger to which the liberties of the world have been exposed; and besides, sir, the disastrous progress of the war in the direction we have chosen to give it; the necessity of abandoning Canada if we should conquer it; the still greater danger which will result from our insisting upon keeping it; the immense stake we put at hazard when we abandon the defence of what belongs to us; the folly of letting go the substance to grasp at something worse than the shadow; our accumulating debt; our diminished revenue; our wasted commerce; all, all equally impose upon us the necessity of making this war a war of defence. Let it assume that character, and I repeat again, no vote of mine for men or money shall be withheld. Sir, I have done.

On motion of Mr. BRENT, that this bill, together with the bill from the House of Representatives on the same subject, be referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, it was determined in the negative.

And, after further debate, on motion, by Mr. ANDERSON, it was agreed that the bill be recommitted to the Committee on Military Affairs, and that the bill from the House of Representatives on the subject be referred to the same committee, to consider and report thereon to the Senate.

TUESDAY, January 18.

Mr. BLEDSOE presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, on the subject of compensation to the militia of that State engaged in the service of the United States; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, to consider and report thereon to the Senate, by bill or otherwise.

On motion, by Mr. BIBB, of Georgia, it was agreed that the consideration of the bill to prohibit the importation of certain articles therein described be postponed to Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to incorporate the subscribers to the stock of the Union Bank of Alexandria; and amendment having been proposed, the bill was recommitted to Messrs. ANDERSON, DAGGETT, and BLEDSOE, further to consider and report thereon.

The bill for the purpose of procuring subsistence for the inhabitants of Nantucket, Martha's Vineyard, Block Island, and the adjacent islands thereto, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion, by Mr. BIBB, of Georgia, the title was amended, "An act authorizing the President of the United States to grant certain permissions to the inhabitants of the island of Nantucket."

WEDNESDAY, January 19.

The following Message was yesterday received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I lay before Congress a report of the acting Secretary of the Treasury, containing a statement of proceedings under the "Act to regulate the laying out and making a road from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio."

BOUNTY FOR ENLISTMENT.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the committee to whom was referred the bill from the House of Representatives, entitled "An act making further provision for filling the ranks of the regular army, encouraging enlistments, and authorizing the reenlistments, for longer periods, of men whose terms of service are about to expire," reported it amended.

He also reported the bill which originated in the Senate, on the same subject, without amendment.

The bill first mentioned, together with the amendments reported thereto, were resumed as in Committee of the Whole; and the question to agree to the following amendment, reported by the select committee:

Section 1, line 3—After the word "despatch," strike out to the end of the section, and insert, in lieu thereof: "there shall be allowed and paid to each effective able-bodied man, who shall, after the first day of February next, be enlisted into the army of the United States, to serve for the term of five years, or during the war, at his election, in lieu of the bounty in money now allowed by law, the sum of one hundred dollars; twenty-five dollars of which to be paid at the time of enlisting the recruit, twenty-five dollars when he shall be mustered and have joined some military corps of the United States for service, and the remaining fifty dollars when he shall be discharged from service, and shall have obtained from the commanding officer of his company, battalion, or regiment, a certificate that he had faithfully performed his duty while in service; and the heirs and representatives of such non-commissioned officers and soldiers, enlisted as hereinbefore stated, who may be killed in action or die in the service of the United States, shall be allowed and paid the said sum of fifty dollars."

And a division of the question was called for, and it was taken on striking out; and passed in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 13, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Anderson, Campbell, Condit, Daggett, Dana, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Leib, Mason, Morrow, Smith, Tait, Wells, and Worthington.

Mr. GORE addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President—I have listened, sir, with undivided attention, to learn if there were any substantial reasons for the passage of this bill. I can perceive none, that are even specious. We may be confident, from the known industry, ingenuity, and information of the honorable chairman of the committee, who introduced the subject, that, if any such existed, he would have produced them. Indeed, sir, the gentleman considers the proposed measure as a mere supplement to another, viz:

the non-importation law; the policy of which is not to be brought into question, at the present time, and on the present occasion.

Should that law be deemed improper, the only mode, in which he thinks its wisdom and policy can be discussed, will be to offer a motion for its repeal. It is not clear, to my mind, how the propriety of this bill can be decided, which is a mere accident, without considering the merits of the principal measure to which it is to be attached, and which it is intended to enforce. If the act, which this is to execute, was originally wrong, or has become so now, although at first proper, we ought, at least, to refrain from doing anything which may give it strength. This is yet in our power. To repeal the law does not depend on this House; the other branch of the Legislature may refuse its concurrence. Should that body concur, the President may decline to afford his approbation; and considering how dear this system is to him, we have a moral certainty he would not. I am, therefore, not satisfied to follow the advice of the honorable chairman, by obeying the rules which he has prescribed to himself, and which seem to have induced him to rest the bill, principally, if not altogether, on the Message of the President. He, too, sir, has omitted to offer any grounds for the opinion he has been pleased to advance. The recommendation of the President is, undoubtedly, entitled to the most respectful attention; but we have no right, by our votes, to sanction error, from whatever source it may come. We ought to refrain from acting, until our minds are convinced of the propriety of the measure recommended. We have already, sir, without any evidence of the assumed fact on which it was recommended, contrary to the conviction of a majority of this House I cannot say, but I may say, contrary to the avowed conviction of some who voted for the measure, passed a bill, in obedience to the will of the Chief Magistrate, which subjects all our citizens to immense loss and privation; which dooms large and populous districts of our country to want and wretchedness; which pronounces to the world, that the citizens of the United States cannot be trusted out of the immediate eye of the Government; that reduces the country to a desert, and then converts it into a prison for its miserable inhabitants, under all the regulations of military discipline.

Enough, sir, has been done, I hope, to satisfy the President, and the world at large, of his weight and influence in this honorable and independent branch of the Legislature. Let us, then, on the present occasion, examine this Message, at least those parts of it which relate to the subject before us, with all the deference which is due to the President, and with all the freedom which is required by our paramount duty to the public.

The Message declares, that "the tendency of our commercial and navigation laws, in their present state, to favor the enemy, and thereby prolong the war, is more and more developed by experience. Abuses of a like tendency take place in our import trade; British fabrics and products find their way into our ports, under the name 'and from the ports of other countries.'"

"To shorten as much as possible the duration of the war, it is indispensable that the enemy should feel all the pressure that can be given to it. The restraints will affect those most who are most ready to sacrifice the interest of their country in pursuit of their own."

The evil complained of is the tendency of our navigation and commercial laws, by allowing the importation of articles of a kind like to those manufactured in England, to introduce British fabrics and products; to favor the enemy, and prolong the war.

The remedy proposed, is the express and absolute prohibition of all such articles, from whatever country they may come. The object is to cause such a pressure on the foe as to shorten the war; that is, to compel him to accede to our terms. It cannot be forgotten, that our commercial and navigation laws prohibit, under heavy penalties, the introduction of all articles of the growth, produce, or manufacture of Great Britain; that our criminal laws are very severe on those who obtain such articles by trading with the enemy. With all these laws against offenders, and penalties imposed on all concerned in the importation of British goods, it is difficult to conceive that any amount of the prohibited articles can be imported, at most to such a degree as to afford to Great Britain any essential means to carry on the war. It is more difficult to conceive what tendency such laws have to bring into our ports British fabrics and products.

The President has been pleased to say, that experience more and more develops these facts and consequences. Let us then, sir, appeal to experience, to ascertain the pressure that is likely to be made by the prohibition proposed, and its effects on the enemy. In our Revolutionary contest we endeavored, by refusing to import her manufactures, to oblige Great Britain to listen to our just complaints. We were aided by the great body of her merchants and manufacturers, trading to this country, by some of the most opulent of her corporations, and by the talents and eloquence of her most distinguished and influential statesmen. All these were without effect; she disregarded the pressure, and was inexorable to our complaints.

The war ensued, and laws against the importation of all goods the growth, produce, and manufacture of Great Britain, were enacted. No one will doubt those laws were as faithfully executed then as now. The pressure, whatever it was, had not the smallest effect. She swerved not from her purpose, until all Europe engaged in the war against her; until we had captured two of her largest and best appointed armies, under the command of her most renowned and illustrious Generals, nor until an hostile fleet swept the British Channel, and braved her navy in her own ports. In the Spring of 1806 we again uplifted this weapon, so terrible in our eyes, so harmless in her's; we passed a law prohibiting the importation of certain articles, of the manufacture of

SENATE.

Great Britain; but the blow was suspended for seven months; at the end of this time, eight months more of grace were allowed to the alleged offenders against our rights, with a power to the President to extend the time six months longer, in which she might redeem our favor. No effect was produced. Shortly after the lapse of this term, a general embargo was imposed. In March, 1809, when President Jefferson, and his very obsequious Congress, who, at his mere suggestion, passed that abominable act, and its arbitrary and unconstitutional supplements, were obliged to capitulate with public opinion, and repeal their odious laws, a non-intercourse was established against France and England, and conditions held out to these great Powers, a compliance with which should relieve them from this dreadful pressure. On application to one of them to accept our good will and custom, and aid in extricating us from the effects of our own folly, we were tauntingly told that Great Britain had no interest in the repeal of our laws, nor in relieving us from the awkward predicament in which we had been pleased to place ourselves. By the other, our ships were burned, our property plundered, our national character, our Government, and people insulted and reviled in the grossest manner, and in the face of the world. All this was borne with a patience that was never surpassed by the meanest of vassal nations, and unequalled by any that ever made the smallest pretensions to independence. In this exercise of our restrictive energies, according to the strange language of the day, we reaped nothing but misfortune and disgrace. At length, smarting under the failure of our abortive schemes, and stung with the mortifying conviction that the world saw and ridiculed our extreme weakness, in attempting such mighty ends by such feeble means, we rushed, unprovided and unprepared, into a war of arms, with a nation amply provided and well prepared to contend with all the Powers of the earth. Thus much for our experience of the pressure, and the effects thereof on Great Britain, by prohibiting the importation of her manufactures.

We can draw still deeper on experience, to test the soundness or futility of such measures, if we will revert to the efforts of the potent Emperor of France on Great Britain. To aid his numerous armies in the conquest of those proud islanders, he prohibited the use of her manufactures, not only in his own dominions, and in those of his vassal States, but throughout all Europe; and for many years he succeeded in causing this prohibition to be general over the Continent. No foothold could Great Britain obtain on which to empty her overloaded stores and magazines, but some distant island or some obscure port in the North Sea. She was shut out from the market of more than an hundred millions of people, by this seemingly all-powerful monarch; undismayed she met the world in arms, bore every privation for the loss of open markets for the labor of her people, and the products of her vast possessions, without discovering the smallest symptoms of yielding an iota of her pretensions. Her proud and unbending neck spurned the yoke. It bent not the least, although we too added our mite to the pressure. She never hesitated between the alternative of no trade, or a surrender of what she deemed her rights. The effects of her firmness and perseverance are not likely to render her more submissive to the blows we have inflicted, or to those we are preparing for her by this bill. She now has all the world courting her trade, and receiving her products, diminished France and impoverished America excepted.

When she considers how successfully she met her numerous foes, armed also with prohibitions and proscriptions of her products on every foot of land, from the Baltic to the Mediterranean, and compares the situation of her then enemies with that of our fallen country, will she be frightened into submission by the increased pressure of this act? She attempts to capture our ships, to destroy our trade, and prevent us from receiving supplies from abroad. We co-operate most manfully in this work of ruin; nay, we do more to this end, in a few short days, than she could do in many years. We annihilate our ships, destroy our produce, imprison all our citizens, suffer not one to escape from the United States, doom whole States to sloth and famine, allow no man, woman, or child, to cross a river or bay without permission from the President, to obtain the smallest comfort in the greatest need, break down all the barriers heretofore thought necessary to the support of public and individual liberty, disregard the provisions of our Constitution, and subject ourselves and property to martial law. When our vindictive foe has obtained so efficient an ally, in bringing destruction on the people of this country, he may cheerfully sustain the loss which will be incurred by retaining at home, or selling at a reduced price, the few blankets that might be smuggled into the United States by some crafty foreigner from a neutral port.

The remedy proposed for this enormous evil, as it is believed, the practice of which is supposed to afford to Great Britain the power of continuing the war against us, is an express and absolute prohibition of articles of a kind like to those of British fabrics from all countries. The existing laws render liable to forfeiture all British goods, and three times their value, and the vessel or carriage which shall convey them. These laws, moreover, render the master of the vessel, and all parties to the offence, liable to heavy and severe penalties, and superadd to those inflicted by public law, and by the common law of the land, other and more aggravated penalties.

If the people of the United States be as profligate, as the Message referred to supposes them, and do now risk all the fines and forfeitures, pains and penalties, to which they are liable, will such an act as the one proposed effectually secure the entire exclusion of such goods?

The Emperor of France, I will not say more despotic in the quality of his laws than the Government of the United States, but possessing greater power, exerted all the ingenuity of his inquisitive policy, and employed his vast means, to detect offences against his prohibitory statutes, and, when detected, punished them with unmitigated severity. Yet the prohibited goods were to be found in every part of the Continent, and in the very heart of his dominions. Surely such a lesson will not be lost on any Legislature, guided by a sound discretion, nor on any man not predetermined to shut his eyes against the light of experience.

It is not merely the experience of the present day to which I would ask the attention of gentlemen. The experience of all times, and of all nations, has shown that the most arbitrary, even the most sanguinary provisions of the best executed laws are ineffectual against the introduction of foreign commodities, which are better and cheaper than the domestic. It has been truly said, the strongest, the highest bars, that the tyranny or folly of Government can erect, always have, and we may therefore safely predict always will, prove powerless against the cheapness of foreign articles. Private interest will either overleap or burst them asunder. Laws against the long-continued habits, and the manifest benefit of a people, serve but to corrupt their morals, to compromise the character of Government, to expose its weakness, and finally to render it both odious and contemptible.

To render the miserable system, of which this bill is to be the keystone, more palatable, we are told encouragement will hereby be afforded to our own manufactures. This comes with an ill grace, indeed, from that Government which has most unfeelingly destroyed all the numerous manufactures that spring from, and are supported by, navigation and commerce. Manufactures that inspire health, courage, firmness, and intrepidity, that nerve the arm and invigorate the mind, that provide you men, at all times, able and willing to defend the soil blessed by their industry, and to advance the glory of a nation that has the wisdom to protect and cherish them.

Instead of these hardy employments you offer the loom and shuttle. You huddle together men, women, and children, in one contaminated and contaminating mass, and will soon render your men more effeminate than your women. You have sentenced the sons of industry and enterprise to penury and want, and expect to stifle their complaints by sending them to work at a machine, where an idiot can work as skilfully as themselves, and a feeble girl of ten years of age can earn as much.

I know, sir, the people of this country are patient beyond all example. They have believed the Government was not hostile to their interests. They have been taught to think the privation they endured was a necessary price for the protection of their rights, and the support of their freedom. This opiate, which has been so plentifully administered, must, and will lose its effect. They cannot continue the dupes of that policy, of which they are so manifestly the victims. They will not stoop to beg; they cannot see their wives and children perish with hunger and nakedness. You take from them their livelihood, and restrain them from the sad privilege of seeking abroad that bread which you will not permit them to earn at home. They will feel themselves degraded and insulted by being told, that they must fight the enemy for their rights, when the Government, which ought to be their friend and protector, deprives them of all their rights, of even the means of obtaining subsistence, and at the same time renders them the scoff and ridicule of the world.

Would to Heaven, sir, the Government might awake from its own fatal illusions, before it be too late, before the people shall awake to the deformity of that despotism which debases and oppresses them!

The President tells you the restraints will affect those most who are most ready to sacrifice the interests of their country in pursuit of their own. These restraints will affect all who use any articles like those which are prohibited. The bill grants a monopoly to the manufacturer, at the expense of every one who wears the article which he makes. You tax the weaver the difference that is occasioned in price, by want of those commodities, which would have been imported had not your prohibition been imposed.

By the destruction of commerce, with its dependant arts, and the flattering bounties you thereby heap on the favored manufactures, you prematurely seduce the capitalists of the country into new and untried employments. When peace returns, and trade shall be restored, should that ever be the case, these manufactures will not compete with foreign. They will then be destroyed with the same apathy that is now discovered in the destruction of others that are more useful. From the high price of labor in America, the cheapness, quantity, and excellence of our lands, and the profitable employment of capital in foreign commerce, we cannot expect to manufacture many articles so cheap as they can be afforded from other countries, less fortunately situated. Such will, then, be imported, and the numerous adventurers in these new establishments must fail. Sad, but certain result of not leaving to the sagacity of individuals, at all times more quick-sighted and intelligent on subjects of this sort than the wisest Governments, the employment of their wealth, and the exercise of their own industry.

All writers, sir, on political economy; all nations, except our own; all statesmen, except those who rule the destinies of the United States; are satisfied of the vast importance of commerce to the population, the riches, and prosperity of a country; that, with it, are inseparably connected individual wealth and national power, of which it is essentially the source and support.

From some cause, which I will not now undertake to develop, but which is, at last, pretty well understood throughout this country, the efforts of our Government have all tended directly to the destruction of commerce. To this end it has been loaded with all the shackles and restrictions for which any pretence could be invented, and to as high a degree, and as long as the patience of the people would bear. Congress has now finally suppressed all that can be exercised by our own citizens, both foreign and domestic.

The little remnant which had been spared from prohibitions, proscriptions, embargoes, and war measures against Great Britain, at the evident hazard of offending the few friends which remain to us in the civilized world, is now to be sacrificed to this exterminating spirit. Not an article, of which wool or cotton is an ingredient, is to be admitted from abroad. By far the greatest portion of the apparel of the whole population of this country, is composed of wool or cotton. It cannot be pretended that one-half the supply necessary to cover our citizens from absolute nakedness, can be made at home. Without recurring to the uncertain accounts, of who makes and where these goods are made, and the quantities that interested manufacturers pretend can be delivered, there is one fact known to every one, that puts this question beyond all doubt: notwithstanding the immense influx of those articles in the Autumn of 1812, and the quantities which we are told find their way into the United States from Great Britain, as well as from other parts of the world, goods of this kind, especially of the coarser sort, and such as are used almost exclusively by the poor, have been sold for a year past at three times the amount of their original cost, whereas, in common and ordinary times, forty, or at most fifty per cent. advance, on the first price, was considered sufficient to pay all charges, and afford a handsome profit to the importer.

If the bill passes, and effects the exclusion which is expected, the rich must, and will pay the monopoly price of the manufacturer. The poor must suffer extreme distress. Formerly, the number of this class was small, and it has become very large, and soon will embrace a majority of our citizens. On them will fall these restraints. Wherein have they been willing to sacrifice the interests of the country in pursuit of their own? Their poverty is their only crime, and this cannot be charged on them. It flows directly and palpably from the Government. They have been generally, both in faith and practice, devoted to the Administration.

Well may they exclaim, what have we done to merit from your hands both nakedness and hunger? All this is to be inflicted and suffered under the notion, that, by such pitiful schemes, you can compel the most opulent, the most powerful, and the most prosperous, and the proudest nation on the earth, to receive the law at your hands, and to accept peace on your own terms. I forbear to press this subject further. I am persuaded, sir, and I trust this House, if it will exercise its own judgment, will also be persuaded that this bill, if passed into a law, can have no other effect than to render the nation ridiculous, and to increase the misery and distress of a loyal and faithful people, already bowed to the earth with privations and sufferings. There is one other consideration in the minds of many, of greater magnitude than any yet contemplated, against employing our time and our strength in such fruitless schemes, which will now—they always have done—prove a mere ignis-fatuus as relates to the enemy. They delude us from examining into the critical state of our national affairs, and from adopting measures suited to the extreme exigency of our condition.

It is time to cease this trifling, and to look fully at the dangers of our present, and prepare for the horrors of our future situation. On our Southern frontiers we have an invading foe, and no force, that we know of, to prevent desolation and ruin as far as he chooses to proceed. In the West, it is true, we hear the voice of joy and gladness, arising from the great influx of wealth, from projects for new demarcation of boundaries, extended Territories, increasing population, and unclouded prosperity. I really rejoice, sir, that any part of our soil is free from the general gloom, from the otherwise universal despair that pervades the country. I need not say it is only in that highly favored portion of the United States where the occasion or the sound of gladness is to be heard.

On our seaboard we are closely invested by the enemy's fleet, from the St. Croix to the Mississippi, menacing destruction and devastation, should our Government execute their declared purpose. On all that extent of coast, from Louisiana to Maine, we have scarcely a fortress to protect us against this menace, should we proceed the unhallowed length that has been threatened. And we have the most fatal evidence, that our enemy is neither slow, nor measured in his retaliations. On our Northern frontier, late a scene of the most extravagant vaunting, and whence we expected to realize all the promised fruits of the war, we behold our towns, altogether defenceless, and at the mercy of an exasperated foe, the country laid waste and desolate, villages sacked and burning, and their wretched inhabitants naked and forlorn, fleeing in the most inclement seasons from the flames of their houses and the tomahawk of the savage.

All this time the Government of the nation amuses itself, by weighing the degree of pressure it can make on a powerful enemy, by depriving her woollen drapers and cotton weavers of the sale of a few bales of goods. Never was such a scene exhibited, since the day when the master of a great empire thought to divert himself by the most frivolous amusement, while his capital was in flames. Let us quit this disgraceful and humiliating game, and seriously betake ourselves to the protection of our defenceless and neglected inhabitants, restore to them their ancient rights, suffer them to return to cheering industry and honest enterprise, endeavor to bring back peace, prosperity, and, if possible, character to our bleeding country, once the just pride of every American and the envy of every nation, now so fallen, so dishonored, so disgraced, and degraded, as to be unworthy the consideration of the meanest.

The system, sir, of which this is a part, has been tried in youth, and in manhood, in peace, and in war. In no instance has it ever pressed on Great Britain, so as to produce from her a more favorable attention to our complaints. To us it has been pregnant with misfortune and disgrace. When practised by the most populous and most wealthy nations of the earth, it has also been ineffectual. Great Britain has risen triumphant over all the efforts of her numerous foes, and has now as friends almost all those who were her enemies, and nearly the whole world is open to her as a market. It would seem, then, conclusive to any men, not bereft of reason, that to persist in this course of measures, as instruments of war, marks the grossest imbecility of mind and power. We have also seen that the most powerful nations have never been able to execute such a system. The bill before us, and the Message which produced it, confess that we have not executed it; we have tried all the civil and military force of the country, all the forfeiture and penalties, that human ingenuity and uncontrolled power could invent and enact, without effect. It must, therefore, be worse than idle to persist, especially by such feeble means.

I did not, sir, in my motion for striking out, include spirits, distilled from the sugar cane, because I am satisfied we can make at home spirits in as great quantities as can be useful for domestic consumption. The only remaining consideration would be that of revenue. And since, by all the skill of our financiers, and the wisdom of our statesmen, we have only reduced the annual amount of cash, receivable in duties, from sixteen millions to half a million of dollars, it cannot, in the view of the Administration, be important to regard the article in this relation; moreover the prohibition of spirits distilled from cane, and the admission of French brandy, discover a due respect to that power and those interests with which our own seem intimately, if not inseparably and fatally involved.

MARYLAND MEMORIAL.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented the memorial of the House of Delegates of the State of Maryland, on the awful condition of national affairs in general, and the exposed and defenceless situation in which that State in particular, has hitherto been left by the General Government, under the calamities of a war, which, with the consequent measures thereon, they highly disapprove, and earnestly entreating the national authorities to furnish them the necessary munitions and means of defence, together with a speedy reimbursement of the moneys already advanced by the State for those purposes; and that the negotiations for peace, about to be instituted, may be carried on with a just and earnest intention of bringing them to an amicable result.

In presenting the memorial, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: In obedience to the commands of the House of Delegates of Maryland, I have the honor to present to the Senate the address of that honorable body to the President and Congress of the United States.

The substance of the address, sir, is a strong and able view of the present situation of our national affairs; a faithful and emphatical description of the exposed and defenceless condition of the State; and a dignified petition, in the true spirit of the Constitution, for efficient protection and defence. It sketches in glowing colors, and from comprehensive views, the leading causes of the war, and concludes with an earnest and respectful entreaty to the constituted authorities of the nation that they would avail themselves of the present auspicious moment to stay the horrors and calamities that oppress us, and once more restore to our country and its citizens the blessings of peace.

The address then being read by Mr. G., he made a motion that it should be printed.

To this motion, Mr. BLEDSOE, of Kentucky, objected, and called for the ayes and noes.

SENATE.

Some other gentlemen asked what had been the usual course adopted in such cases?

MR. GOLDSBOROUGH said: I am surprised and mortified at the opposition of the honorable Senator from Kentucky. If, sir, I had asked for an extraordinary favor, the discretion of the Senate might have been exercised on the occasion; but as my motion extends only to the customary forms, through which such addresses are permitted to go, I hold the objection unwarranted and unsound. I have before me precedents exactly analogous to this case, which took place no longer ago than the last winter session.

[Mr. G. then read from the journals of the Senate the case of an address from the citizens of Charleston approving the war, presented by Mr. GAILLARD, and on his motion it was printed without opposition. Another case of an address from Boston disapproving the war, presented by Mr. LLOYD, of Boston, and on his motion it was printed without opposition. Another case of an address from the citizens of Richmond approving the war, presented by Mr. GILES; but neither Mr. GILES, nor any other member having made a motion to print it, of course it was not printed.]

These, sir, continued Mr. G., are sufficient precedents to justify the motion I have made. More might be had if more were necessary. Your journals abound with cases in point. I again repeat, sir, that I do not attempt to ask any unusual or special favor to be shown to this address. I claim for it only the ordinary respect that is due in such cases, and this I demand as a right. Yes, sir, as the representative of Maryland on this floor, I demand in the name of the freemen of that State, whose rights are here asserted, and whose complaints are here respectfully set forth, that this address receive that customary and established respect and attention to which the voice of the people, or their delegates, is so highly entitled.

The opposition to the address was persevered in, and sustained by Messrs. GILES, BLEDSOE, and TAYLOR. The motion to print was advocated by Messrs. WELLS, GORE, KING, FROMENTIN, and GOLDSBOROUGH.

The chief grounds of the opposition were, that no practical result was to grow out of the measure; that sufficient respect had already been paid by receiving the address; that a vote to print it would commit the advocates of the war, as it might be construed into a vote of approbation of its contents; that the language was not altogether decorous, and that it called in question the motives of the friends of the war; that although it contained strong censure against the conduct of the French Emperor, there was no complaint against the wrongs of Great Britain.

The Constitutional rights of majorities and minorities, together with the rights of the people, or of either branch of the State Legislatures, to address Congress, were incidentally examined and discussed. It was also objected, that this was the address only of a part of the Legislature.

MR. WORTHINGTON rose and asked the honorable Senator from Maryland, if he contemplated any measure to arise from this address, or whether he intended to ground any legislative act on it? He wished an answer on this point.

MR. GOLDSBOROUGH said:—As I have nothing to conceal on this subject, sir, I take pleasure in gratifying the honorable Senator from Ohio with a frank reply. At this moment I have no intention of founding any legislative act upon this address, because some of its most important objects have already been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs. But I am not prepared to say that I will not do so at a future day; it may depend upon the progress of that committee. But this can be no fair objection to the proposition I have made. Confiding in that great Constitutional right which has ever been deemed inviolable, that the people, or any portion of them, the Legislatures of the States, or either branch of them, may address Congress upon all subjects involving their interests; relying, too, upon the sense of justice, as well as the courtesy of this honorable Senate, I could never have anticipated the opposition that this address has met with.

If no practical result is to grow out of this address, as has been supposed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia near me, (MR. GILES,) it will be alone ascribable to the President and Congress. It depends on them what results are to flow from it. The situation of the State of Maryland, in these disastrous times, is peculiarly alarming and interesting, and ought to recommend her to the parental care of those whose immediate duty it becomes to watch over the common interest, and to provide for the general welfare. The House of Delegates of Maryland, consisting of the immediate Representatives of the people of that State, have, with a vigilance that does them honor, most faithfully interested themselves in behalf of their fellow-citizens, to procure for them that aid which their perilous and exposed condition so loudly called for. They have, in the name of the people they represent, handed in an address to the high authorities of this nation, in which they express, in language unquestionably consistent with the utmost decorum and becoming the responsible station which they fill, their views of public measures, and their influence upon the country. They call on you in a voice, modulated by the Constitution, to which you must attend, if you are not deaf to the claims of justice and dead to the feelings of sympathy, to throw around them your protection, to cover their nakedness, and to guard them from the ravages of an incensed enemy; and they entreat you, in a strain of no ordinary pathos, to pursue the present negotiation for peace with a sincere and ardent zeal for its attainment, thus to relieve our drooping spirits from the calamities of war, and all its incidental horrors and oppressions. What subjects could exist that more imperiously call for the expression of public opinion than these? What subjects more properly deserve to give rise to practical results? To have done less, on the part of the delegates of Maryland, would have evinced a criminal apathy at a moment of general public excitement. To have done less would have argued a torpid insensibility to the wishes, the grievances, and the afflictions of the people.

An objection is also intended against the language of the address, that motives are questioned. I am persuaded, sir, that upon a nearer and more dispassionate view, the objection will vanish. However it may combat the policy of measures, it is silent upon motives; and if the phraseology, as has been remarked by my honorable friend from New York, (Mr. KING,) is not sufficiently diluted, it must be ascribed to that dignity of feeling which is always entertained when our country's welfare is at stake, and to that boldness of thought with which the anxieties of a free people will always inspire those who are intrusted with their confidence. It would have been as unnecessary as indecorous to have questioned the motives of gentlemen; and believe me, sir, as a just tribute to the Maryland House of Delegates, as well as in duty to myself, I must say, I know that body would be incapable of a studied act of indecorum against this or any other department of the Government; or, could it have been otherwise, that a different organ must have been found to have conveyed to you the address than the one that has been selected.

If it is a fault that epithets of opprobrium have been thrown out against the Emperor of France, and none against the conduct of Great Britain, that charge I shall neither attempt to "palliate or deny;" and the only justification I shall offer is, that the wrongs of France, which are as gigantic as they can be, seem not to be so universally estimated and condemned, as their flagitiousness demands, whilst the wrongs of Great Britain are conceded on all sides. We know them, we have felt them, we wish them not to be covered up. But, as on this point there is no difference of opinion among us, (except as to the remedy to be pursued) the authors of the address would as soon have thought of putting into it any threadbare maxim, or self-evident proposition, and called it novelty, as to have considered it necessary to have declared their knowledge of the wrongs of Great Britain. Yes, sir, they, as well as we, have felt the wrongs of Great Britain—they have indignantly felt them, and they wish a similar sensation should be excited against equally unjust and more atrocious conduct on the part of other foreign nations. Not that they wish a war with France, but the contrary: because, that, by an exactness of conduct and feeling towards each, we might have escaped hostilities with either.

It is urged that a vote to print this address might be construed into an approbation of its contents. This, surely sir, is not a necessary or a fair inference. That it has never been so construed, appears from the precedents I produced this morning; and as the style is entirely within the usual Parliamentary limits, I can conceive no objection against its being printed. It has been stated also, that this is the address of a part of the Legislature, and therefore an objection will be against it. This doctrine, sir, is as novel as erroneous. What! cannot any portion of the people petition Congress? Is it not competent to either branch or a part of a branch, of a State Legislature, to lay before Congress their prayers, or their opinions upon public subjects? And are you to inquire here, whether they are of this or that political sect, of the majority or of the minority? Wretched and abject, indeed, is the state of man, when his admission to the exercise of Constitutional rights is made a question of! The rights of minorities are perfect; they are established and guaranteed by the Constitution of the country. To participate in these, we are no suppliants to your grace—we appeal boldly to your sense of duty; and if you deny us there, we demand it in the name of justice, as our right. The established and hitherto defined rights of the people, thus exercised by minorities, so far from being denied, they must not even be questioned. And whenever the time shall come (which, I hope, will not speedily arrive) when these rights are attempted to be invaded or trampled on, nothing will then remain to the minority, but taking the Constitution as their guide, and planting themselves behind its ramparts, to triumph in its defence, or perish amidst its ruins.

I fear, sir, from what has been urged, that an erroneous impression may be entertained of the source of this address. Allow me, for a moment, to explain. The Legislature of Maryland is composed of two branches, which are differently elected, and for different periods of time. The Senate exists for five years; the House of Delegates are annually elected. The former was appointed previous to the declaration of war; the latter, being annually appointed, are the true criterion of the public sentiment. If it is desired to know the state of parties in the House of Delegates, I answer, that more than twelve counties out of nineteen returned, to the two last sessions, members opposed to the war. These constituting a large majority of the House of Delegates, the address came from that body in which the majority existed. What were the numbers of the attending members at the time the vote passed, I know not, nor is it material. This address, then, comes from the predominant party (if you please) in the House of Delegates; and in this I can see nothing that detracts from its value or destroys its authority.

Permit me, sir, also to state that, although this address is the work of the delegates of the people opposed to the war, and was the armor of those who always combated the policy of its declaration, yet, believe me, it contains a subject, and that the most material and interesting part, too, to which, I am persuaded, all parties in the State would cheerfully subscribe—I mean, sir, the exposed and defenceless condition of the State, which it portrays in such vivid colors, and the earnest petition it prefers to you for some protection and succor. This disastrous condition of the State is a melancholy fact, that stares all parties in the face, and fills all hearts with anxiety. On this point, there is as perfect a coincidence of feeling as there is concert of action. We all know our unprotected state, and we all wish and ask for assistance. We think we ought to have it.

Much, sir, has been said of the ferocious character of the enemy. The outrages at Hampton; the conflagration at Havre de Grace, at Frenchtown, at Buffalo, and Black Rock, have been often exhibited to our view to rouse the slumbering vengeance of the nation. Sir, I have nothing to say against the just censure of cruel and atrocious conduct. My heart is already filled with the anguish that this war has caused it. I am as unconcerned at the epithets of opprobrium which gentlemen may please to indulge themselves in against the bloody and cruel acts of the enemy, as any of their friends are. They may pile contumely and reproach and scorn and curses upon each other against the enemy, until the structure is as high as the Alps, and I will neither murmur at this work, nor rob the edifice of one atom of its materials. But, at that moment of fervid feeling, when the mind is thus sensitive to every wrong, and the heart is glowing with indignation, I make my appeal to you in behalf of the exposed inhabitants of Maryland; and I ask you, will you not give them some protection against this merciless foe? Will you abandon them to the shocking embrace of the violator? Will you leave them unprotected against the predatory cruelties of this relentless enemy? Will you yield up your countrymen, together with the sources of their happiness and of their subsistence, a resistless prey to the fury of an enemy, blackened, from your own account, with every crime, and bloody with every cruelty, and hateful for every abomination? If, with this conviction in your hearts, and these expressions on your lips, you withhold from us the means of ample and efficient protection, we shall consider ourselves as the intended victims of a cold blooded, relentless treachery, that hands us over to the sacrifice without a pang. Thus abandoned to our wretched fate, by those who ought to be our guardians; thus severed from their favor, and exiled from their care, we must do justice to our own cause, and, in the last resort, prepare to meet the crisis that may arise. Yet, sir, I hope that this can never occur in our times. It is impossible but that those who rule us should give ear to our complaints, and grant us the comfort we ask. A spirit of philanthropy would yield it, if a sense of duty was wanting. And I do trust, sir, that on all occasions, when we make our appeals to the constituted authorities of the country, we shall experience in return the combined influence of duty, of justice, and of mercy.

An alarming crisis has been hinted at by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. GILES,) as likely to grow out of the heat and animosities of party feeling. I submit to the justness of the remark, as I have done to many others by which I have been instructed, that have fallen from that honorable Senator since I have had the pleasure of knowing him. It is too true, that his anticipations are too well founded. With him, I deplore it most sincerely. But, I have nothing to reproach myself with on this score. They who know me best will acquit me. To put off, and, if possible, to prevent the apprehended evil, it is better not to question ancient and established rights too closely—not to graduate them too much with rigid nicety. When pressed to the farthest line of retreat, a jealousy begins to grow, which discloses all its views. On this point, there is no compromise; and, as a Representative of a State, I can capitulate upon no terms short of full Constitutional right.

The question was then taken on the motion to print the memorial, and decided as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, German, Gilman, Goldsborough, Gore, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lambert, Mason, Stone, and Wells.

NAYS—Messrs. Anderson, Bledsoe, Campbell, Chace, Condit, Gaillard, Giles, Howell, Lacock, Leib, Morrow, Taylor, Turner, Varnum, and Worthington.

Ayes 15, nays 15—so the question was lost.

orders for retaliation on either side, which the President may judge proper to be communicated.

SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY.

The Senate resumed, agreeably to the order of the day, the resolution submitted by Mr. MASON on the 24th January.

Mr. BIBB, of Georgia, said, that when these resolutions should be discussed, he believed he could show that they were out of order, and therefore not admissible; but as he was about to propose a postponement, he should not raise the question of order. Whenever, he said, it should be ascertained by the Executive that Mr. Gallatin would not speedily return, it had been in its contemplation to appoint a Secretary of the Treasury in his stead. Late circumstances had induced the impression that his speedy arrival was at least doubtful; and he believed that the Executive had determined to appoint a Secretary for the Department over which that gentleman had presided. This was a reason sufficient to induce the mover of these resolutions to consent to postpone their consideration to Monday. If a Secretary should not at that time have been nominated, the resolutions might be taken up, and Mr. B. said he would submit the question of order to which he had before adverted. But he had, on his part, no sort of doubt the alleged vacancy in the Treasury would in the meantime be filled.

Mr. MASON expressed his earnest desire that these resolutions should be taken up at an early day. The postponement to this day had been made at the suggestion of the gentleman who now moved a further postponement, and nearly for the same reasons as were now assigned. The subject Mr. M. conceived to be all important—the more so as an opinion had been publicly expressed on this floor, when a motion was made to postpone (a day or two ago), that the office of Secretary of the Treasury was vacant. That opinion he believed was entertained by many; and, if the fact were so, it was time that something should be done on the subject. As to the alleged intention to appoint a Secretary of the Treasury, he did not know that it ought to have weight at all—the object of his motion being to declare the Constitutional law on this subject. If this motion was persisted in, Mr. M. said he must enter generally into the subject, to show why it should not prevail. As he was unwilling, however, to enter incidentally into a subject of this magnitude, if the gentleman would vary his motion to an earlier day, he would consent to the postponement.

After some conversation across the House, between Messrs. MASON and BIBB, in an undertone, Mr. BIBB varied his motion for postponement to Friday; and the motion was agreed to, nem. con.

PATENT RIGHTS.

Mr. SMITH, from the committee to whom was referred the memorial of Isaac McPherson and others, on the subject of the patent granted to Oliver Evans, under the act of the 21st January, 1808, entitled "An act for the relief of Oliver Evans," made a report; which was read. The report is as follows:

That in the year 1787, Oliver Evans obtained from the States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland, laws vesting him with the exclusive right to use, in those States, the elevator and hopperboy, being inventions or improvements claimed to have been made by him in the process of the art of manufacturing flour. That, in the year 1790, he obtained a patent under the laws of the United States for the elevator and hopperboy, and also for the screw or conductor, an additional improvement in the art, claimed also as his invention and improvement; that for fourteen years (the term of his first patent) he continued to receive, from nearly all the persons employed in the art of manufacturing flour, from thirty to forty dollars (being the prices which he then deemed sufficient) for the use of the machinery for each water wheel.

That, about three years after the expiration of his patent, to wit: in the year 1807, a suit, pending in the court of Pennsylvania, was decided against him, "on the ground that his patent was deficient in form, and, therefore, invalid." It is, however, believed by your committee, that its invalidity was unknown until after the trial; and that nearly all engaged in the manufacturing of flour, during the term of his patent, had paid. A plea, however, was made by the said Oliver Evans, to wit: that little benefit had arisen to him from his patent, because of the deficiency in form thereof; and Congress, in consequence, passed a law, dated 21st January, 1808, "for the relief of Oliver Evans;" thereby granting to the said Evans, his "heirs, &c., for a term not exceeding fourteen years, the full and exclusive right and liberty of making, constructing, using, and vending to be used, his invention, discovery, and improvement in the art of making flour and meal, and in the several machines which he has invented, improved, and applied to that purpose.

That, under that act, a patent issued to the said Evans, dated 22d January, 1808, for the term of fourteen years. By the authority derived therefrom, he claims that there is secured to him, not only the exclusive privilege of using the machine specified therein, but a power to "prohibit the use of any other invention that shall accomplish the same effect, although the principles be ever so different." In proofwhereof, the said Evans has actually instituted a suit against Jeremiah Bayley, to recover damages for using his own invention, (for which he has received a patent,) which, by the application of wind, conveys wheat or flour from one part of a mill to another.

Since the passage of the said act, he, the said Evans, has demanded and received for the use of his machinery unusual, and, in the opinion of your committee, extravagant prices, to wit: for a pair of stones of four and a half feet diameter, for which, under his first patent, he charged thirty dollars, he now demands three hundred dollars; for those of six feet, for which he formerly received forty dollars, he now charges five hundred and twenty dollars; and for a pair of seven feet stones, his demand is seven hundred and thirty-five dollars. For a mill (now building) to run five pair of stones of seven feet diameter, his demand is three thousand six hundred and seventy-five dollars, for which, under his former patent, he would only have demanded two hundred dollars.

The memorialists have produced proof to show that the said Evans is not the original inventor of any of the machinery specified in his patent, to wit: that the principles of the elevator have been known for ages, and particularly in latter years, through their use in the well known operation of the chain pump. That the hopperboy was invented by Christian Stouffer, and used in the mills of his father, brother, and others, prior to the year 1775. That the screw or conductor was invented and used by Jonathan Ellicot, prior to the date of the first patent obtained by the said Evans in 1790. It is admitted by the said Evans that he is not the original inventor of any of the principles of the machines specified in his patent, but that he is the inventor of improvements therein, and that he has combined and applied the whole to operate their present useful effects; that is to say, that he invented the leather strap, and improved and applied the principles of the chain pump to the purposes now in use for his elevator; that he has improved the hopper machine, now called the hopperboy; and that he has made some useful improvements in the conductor, and has applied it to the purposes specified in his patent. The memorialists have submitted proof to show that the elevator, by a strap, had been in use in the year 1786, in the mill of Marshal and Stroud, near the residence of the said Evans, which had been seen by him, and that, in consequence, they, Marshal and Stroud, had been exempted from payment for the use of the elevator and hopperboy, under the acts of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and Maryland.

The committee are of opinion, that the act for the relief of Oliver Evans was an act of benevolence which Congress were under no obligation to grant, his patent having expired nearly three years; that it could not have been expected that an act of such high favor would have been used for the purpose of extortion and oppression. It must have been believed that the patentee, grateful for the extraordinary favor conferred on him, would have used the right reinstated in him with moderation and temper. It is, however, with regret that the committee are compelled to state that he has abused the power vested in him by an act intended for his relief, to the oppression of individuals, by the exaction of exorbitant sums of money for the use of the machines specified in his patent, and by his attempt to prevent the use of the inventions of others, which, although entirely different in principle, are capable of operating the same effect.

To prevent the said Evans from abusing (in future) the power vested in him, the committee submit a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act for the relief of Oliver Evans."

Mr. SMITH then, from the same committee, reported a bill to amend the act, entitled "An act for the relief of Oliver Evans," and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading. And the Senate adjourned.

MONDAY, February 28.

YEAS—Messrs. Bibb of Kentucky, Bledsoe, Brent, Brown, Condit, Daggett, Dana, Fromentin, German, Giles, Gilman, Gore, Horsey, Howell, Hunter, King, Lambert, Morrow, Robinson, Smith, Stone, Taylor, Varnum, and Wells.

NAYS—Messrs. Bibb of Georgia, Chace, Gaillard, Lacock, Roberts, Tait, Turner, and Worthington.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the issuing of Treasury notes for the service of the year 1814," and it was ordered to a third reading.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

It has appeared that, at the recovery of the Michigan Territory from the temporary possession of the enemy, the inhabitants thereof were left in so destitute and distressed a condition as to require from the public stores certain supplies essential to their subsistence, which have been prolonged under the same necessity which called for them.

The deplorable situation of the savages, thrown by the same event on the mercy and humanity of the American commander at Detroit, drew from the same source the means of saving them from perishing by famine; and, in other places, the appeals made by the wants and sufferings of that unhappy description of people have been equally imperious.

The necessity imposed by the conduct of the enemy in relation to the savages, of admitting their co-operation, in some instances, with our arms, has also involved occasional expense in supplying their wants; and it is possible that a perseverance of the enemy in their cruel policy may render a further expense for the like purpose inevitable.

On these subjects an estimate from the Department of War will be laid before Congress, and I recommend a suitable provision for them.

JAMES MADISON.

the memorial; which was read, and referred to Messrs. GILES, SMITH, and HUNTER, to whom was referred the above-mentioned memorial, to consider and report thereon.

EXECUTIVE APPOINTMENTS.

The following motion was made by Mr. GORE, with closed doors, on the 28th of February last:

The President of the United States having by the Constitution power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions which shall expire at the end of their next session:

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, no such vacancy can happen in any office not before full.

Resolved, That, in the opinion of the Senate, the office of Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to negotiate and sign a Treaty of Peace with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, had not been filled at any time after the declaration of war upon the eighteenth day of June, A. D. 1812, and before the late recess of the Senate upon the third day of March last, when the same was not full.

Resolved, That the granting of commissions to Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, to be Envoys Extraordinary and Ministers Plenipotentiary, to negotiate and sign a treaty of peace with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, during the late recess of the Senate, as in the President's Message to the Senate of the twenty-ninth day of May last, is stated to have been done, was not, in the opinion of the Senate, authorized by the Constitution, inasmuch as a vacancy in that office did not happen during such recess of the Senate, and as the Senate had not advised and consented to their appointment: Whereupon,

Resolved, That, while the Senate venerate the authority and dignity of the office of President of the United States, and will, at all times, as a high and essential power in the Constitution, exert themselves to maintain and preserve undiminished the whole Executive authority thereby established, they owe it to the trust confided to themselves, as well as to the States, their constituents, to protect the power over appointments to office, which the Constitution has placed in that body. From these considerations, joined to the conviction that the rights of the Senate have been infringed by an important act, to the validity of which the advice and consent of the Senate were essential; the Senate find themselves called upon, by their duty to the States, and in support of the Constitution, reluctantly to protest, and they do hereby solemnly protest, against the commissioning as aforesaid of Albert Gallatin, John Q. Adams, and James A. Bayard, as an act not authorized by the Constitution, and in the performance of which, the power of the Senate has been disregarded.

Resolved, That an authenticated copy of the foregoing resolution be delivered to the President, by a committee of — members of the Senate.

On motion, by Mr. TURNER, this day having been assigned for the consideration thereof, with open doors, it was accordingly taken up.

Mr. GORE addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President:—The subject which occasioned these resolutions will be readily recognised to be the President's commissioning Messrs. Gallatin, Adams, and Bayard, Envoys Extraordinary, to negotiate a Treaty of Peace with the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, during the recess of the Senate, prior to their session in May last.

When the Message of the President announced that he had commissioned these gentlemen during the recess, the supposed irregularity was noticed, and frequently made the topic of discussion. It was then remarked that, although the granting the commission during the recess might be irregular, it was not an evidence against the fitness of the gentlemen for the office to which they were named. The advice and consent of the Senate to their appointment could only give validity to the commission which would issue after the date of such advice and consent. That the nomination, with its circumstances, was sufficiently perplexing, without the addition of any difficulties that were not necessarily involved in its consideration. That the subject of the resolutions, if pressed at that time, might unduly influence in the question of appointing the Envoys, and the desire of appointing them might, on the other hand, have an improper influence in the decision of this question. The subject was therefore waived until the Senate had acted on the nomination. The resolutions were then brought forward, but this was so late in the session, that several members had gone home, and all were preparing to go. They were therefore postponed. So soon as the Senate appeared to be as full as it was expected to be this session, the resolutions were brought forward.

I have thought it not improper, sir, to make this statement, as a reason why this subject has been so long delayed, and why it is brought forward at the present time, and, I trust, under such circumstances, as will insure to it a temperate discussion, and a just decision.

The second section of the second article of the Constitution treats of the power of appointment to office, under that instrument. It constitutes and defines the authorities, in whom this power shall be vested, the circumstances in which it may be varied, and the modifications wherewith it may be exercised.

Speaking of the President, the section declares, "he shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, Judges of the Supreme Court, and all other officers of the United States, whose appointments are not herein otherwise provided for, and which shall be established by law. But the Congress may, by law, vest the appointment of such inferior officers, as they think proper, in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments."

"The President shall have power to fill all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at the end of their next session."

The power of appointment is vested in the President and Senate with specified exceptions, otherwise provided for, by the Constitution itself, and of such cases of inferior officers, whose appointments Congress may by law vest in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments. The depositing of this power of appointment in these two great departments of Government was, from the very nature and constitution of one of them, subject to inconvenience. The President, at all times and in all places, contains, within his own person, all the powers and authorities of his high office. This department is always in existence.

The Senate consists of various members, having no power or authority, but when legally assembled together, and acting in a body, under one head, and with their recording officers. They were neither expected nor intended to be always in session.

Vacancies in office might happen during their recess.

To guard against a failure of the public service, from this circumstance, the Constitution provides a remedy, taking especial care that the remedy shall be no greater, than to relieve against the mischief that was apprehended.

To this end, it declares that the President, one of these departments, a portion of this depository of the general authority of appointment, shall have power to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate, by granting commissions, which shall expire at their next session.

The power of appointment is vested, conjointly, in two branches of the Government. A case is described, in which one branch may, under special circumstances, exercise a modified power. What is that case? It is the case of a vacancy in an office, a vacancy of a certain and definitive character, viz: a vacancy that may happen during the recess of the Senate. If the vacancy happen at another time, it is not the case described by the Constitution; for that specifies the precise space of time wherein the vacancy must happen, and the times which define this period bring it emphatically within the ancient and well-established maxim: "Expressio unius est exclusio alterius."

The reason why the Constitution adopts this precise language and so strictly limits the case, is evident from the spirit and intention of that instrument, in the distribution of the powers thereby created and delegated.

The intent of the Constitution was to vest the power of appointment in two departments of the Government. It would defeat its own purpose, then, were it to authorize one of these departments to exercise this power, except in the specified case in which the public interest may require immediate action, and the other could not be convened seasonably for this purpose.

An office is created by the Constitution, or by some law in pursuance thereof. A vacancy may be said to exist in such office, immediately after its creation. Such, however, is not the case provided for by the clause under examination. It is the case of a vacancy that may happen during the recess of the Senate.

If the vacancy existed during the session, it could not be said to have happened during the recess; that is, within a period which, ex vi terminorum, excludes the very time when it did happen.

If a vacancy happen in an office, the office must have been before full; for, to assert that a vacancy has happened, necessarily implies the fact, that such office had previously an incumbent—that it was before full. If a vacancy exist prior to, it does not happen in the recess of the Senate. Therefore, for a vacancy to happen at any time in an office, that office must have been full at some time previous to the period when it did happen; for a vacancy to happen during the recess of the Senate, the office must have been full during their session prior to, and at the commencement of their recess. Were it not for the precision of language used in this grant to the President, and the unavoidable construction thereof, a great and manifest object of the Constitution, viz: the vesting the power of appointment in two great organs of the Government, the President and the Senate, might have been totally defeated, by an assumption of the whole power by the President.

Vacancies exist in all offices, however created, until persons are appointed to fill them.

If an office had been created by law, or otherwise, and brought into existence during the session of the Senate, it would be only for the President to wait until their recess to commission a person to fill the vacant office, prefer his name to the Senate at their next session, and a short time before their recess. If disapproved, he may be re-commissioned immediately on the adjournment, and the same course be pursued at the subsequent as at the preceding session. In this way an officer, and, if one, all officers, might be commissioned and continued in office, as long as the President should please, not only without, but contrary to, the advice and consent of the Senate, a department of the Government constituted by the Constitution an essential branch in the power of appointment.

The second resolution is an assertion of the opinion of the Senate as to a mere matter of fact, which I presume will not be doubted, and although necessary to effect the conclusion contained in the subsequent resolutions, needs no comment.

The third seems to be an unavoidable corollary from the opinions and facts declared in the preceding resolutions and in this.

The observations before made preclude the necessity of much remark on this resolution, as most which would be pertinent now have already been presented to the consideration of the Senate. Some general notice, however, will be taken of the powers and authorities of the Constitution in regard to the subject under discussion.

In recurring to the Constitutional power of appointment it will be seen that it consists of two branches of authority, to be exercised by two distinct bodies, acting independently of each other; but, in order to effectuate an appointment, both must concur.

The power of nomination is exclusively in the President. That of appointment is vested in the President and Senate jointly, and their advice and consent are as necessary to effect an appointment as the nomination of the President.

If the Constitution stopped at the end of the second paragraph of the section before quoted, the only inquiry, in order to determine on the necessity of the advice and consent of the Senate to an appointment, would be, whether the officer were an inferior officer, and whether Congress had by law vested the appointment in the President alone, in the courts of law, or in the heads of departments.

The answer in the case now under consideration is, Congress have made no law respecting it; and, further, that Congress have no power to vest the appointment of these officers in any one, they not being inferior officers.

If Congress have no power to vest this appointment in the President alone, it would seem free from all doubt, that the President could not rightfully exercise such an authority; and equally so, that the Senate could not surrender their authority, or acquiesce in its exercise by another. The Senate is a trustee for the benefit of the public, of all the powers vested in them. Wherever a power is vested in a trustee, there is a correspondent duty to exercise such power, and not to surrender it to another.

It will not be amiss, in considering this subject, to keep in view how sacredly the people intended to guard this right, and this duty in the Senate, by not permitting that body, even with the concurrence of the House of Representatives, and the President, to discharge itself of such a duty, by a surrender thereof to any other body.

If it be attempted to defend this appointment, it will probably be on the last paragraph in this section, which authorizes the President to fill up all vacancies that may happen during the recess of the Senate. Sufficient has been said, I trust, to show that no authority can be derived from this clause.

It has been suggested, that the President has a right, by the Constitution, to create the office of Ambassadors and other public Ministers. An office is created by the Constitution, or by some power under it. Prior to its being so created, it does not exist. Whatever power is granted, as regards the appointment of public Ministers, is in that clause which says, "the President shall nominate, and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall appoint." If this, then, be the power of creating the office, it must be an actual appointment, and that can be only by the President and Senate. No other authority than what is embraced by these words can be found for the creation of the office of public Ministers, and this is not in the President alone, but in the President and Senate. In other words, the appointment makes the office, and the appointment cannot be made without the concurrent judgment of these two great organs of the Government.

Perhaps it may be more proper to consider the office of Ambassador and public Minister as necessarily existing, from the relation of the United States, as an independent Power to other independent Powers, and thus recognised by the Constitution. Most offices are created by laws enacted by Congress. The practice has been, in cases where there is reason to apprehend that sufficient time will not be afforded, during the session of the Senate, for a proper selection of persons to fill such offices, and that inconveniences might result from delay till their next session, to authorize the President to appoint such officers in the recess of the Senate. This course will be found to have been adopted early in the history of this Government. There is one act to this effect, of March 3, 1791, volume 1, page 301. This was in the second session of the 1st Congress. And the practice has been invariably continued since. An act is also made (March 3, 1799) to authorize the President to fill up vacancies that happen during the session of the Senate.

In these cases the offices undoubtedly exist, and the authority given to the President in them, goes on the presumption that there exists a vacancy at the time of passing the act, and that such vacancy will exist during the recess of the Senate. If nothing further were necessary, than the existence of an office, and a vacancy therein, to entitle the President, constitutionally, to make the appointment in the recess of the Senate, this authority, by law, would be unnecessary.

Congress, then, and this Senate, as one branch of Congress, seem to have settled the question, and one may fairly say, the President also; for if, in his opinion, the power of appointment to vacant offices was vested in him by the Constitution, he would hardly consent to receive that power from Congress, especially as thus receiving it must be construed into an acknowledgment that he could derive no such power immediately from the Constitution. The construction of an instrument made contemporaneously with, or shortly after, its formation, may be safely relied on for disclosing the intention of the framers, in the language they used.

It is well known that the first President of the United States was also President of the Convention that reported the Constitution; and that two of the heads of departments, and many of the first Senate, had been distinguished members of the same Convention.

It will be found, by a reference to the Executive Journals of the Senate during the Administration of President Washington, that at each session of the Senate, and shortly after their meeting, he sent messages on the subject of appointments during the recess, that left no doubt of his construction of the Constitution in this particular—vol. 1, pp. 236, 389; vol. 2, pp. 9, 76. In addition to the conclusion to be drawn from these messages of President Washington, a fact is stated by Chief Justice Marshall, in his Life of Washington, which shows distinctly the construction of that great man on his Constitutional powers, in a case analogous to the one under consideration; and that, notwithstanding the circumstances were urgent, he did not feel himself authorized to act in the recess of the Senate, in the case of a vacancy that did not happen in such recess.

Thus, sir, I have supported the construction of the Constitution contained in the resolution now on your table, by the literal sense and meaning of the terms used in that instrument, by its obvious spirit and intent, by the judgment of the President, Senate, and House of Representatives, repeatedly, deliberately, and solemnly given, in their legislative acts, and by the uniform conduct of President Washington during his Administration.

To maintain the rights of this department of the Government, and thereby protect those of the States, represented in this body, is not only the privilege, but a sacred duty of the Senate, with which, in my judgment, we are not at liberty either to compromise or equivocate.

To the end, then, sir, that we may arrest the progress of an evil, which subverts the organization of the Government, by depriving the Senate of their Constitutional authorities, and vesting them in the President of the United States, I propose these resolutions, which contain the solemn protest of the Senate, and provide for its presentation to the Supreme Magistrate.

NAVAL ESTABLISHMENT.

Mr. GAILLARD, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, communicated a letter, together with sundry documents from the Secretary for the Department of Navy; which were read, and ordered to be printed. The letter is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Feb. 22, 1814.

SIR: I have the honor to submit the following in answer to your letter of the 20th December last.

Three ships of 74 guns each, and of the largest class, are now building, of prime materials, and in the most substantial and durable manner, viz: one at Portsmouth, New Hampshire, one at least at Charlestown, Massachusetts, and one at Philadelphia. The two former, it is expected, will be launched in the month of July, and the latter in the month of December next.

Three ships of 44 guns each, of the largest class, are also building, of durable materials, in the best manner, viz: one at Philadelphia, one at Baltimore, and one at the navy yard in this city. The two former it is expected, will be launched by the middle of April, and the latter in all the month of July next.

The six sloops of war, authorized by law, have all been built, in the most substantial manner, and of good materials. Two of which are ready for sea; three more have nearly completed their crews, and will, probably, be ready for sea in ten or twelve days, and the sixth is now equipping at the navy yard in this city.

Six barges have been purchased at Philadelphia; also, four at Baltimore, and one at Norfolk.

Eight have been built at Baltimore; ten are nearly completed on the Eastern Shore of Maryland; four have been built, and one is now building at the navy yard in this city; five are building at Charleston, South Carolina; six at St. Mary's, Georgia; and preparatory measures are now in operation to increase the force in North Carolina, and at New Orleans, in vessels of this description, as fast as men can be procured to man them.

Previous to the year 1813, it appears that no timber had been procured under the act of March 30th, 1812; but early in the year 1813, timber to the amount of $23,000 was purchased at Baltimore, under the act of March 30th, 1812 "suitable for rebuilding the frigates Philadelphia, General Greene, New York, and Boston;" but as there is no appropriation or authority to rebuild those frigates, and as the Philadelphia is not in existence, and the General Greene, New York, and Boston, are rotten, worthless hulks, that would cost much more, in proportion to their value, to rebuild them, than to build new frigates, of a better class, and vastly superior construction, a part of that timber has been applied to the building of the 44 and the sloops of war at Baltimore, and the 74 and 44 at Philadelphia.

Contracts for, and purchases of timber, to a very considerable amount, have been made for naval purposes during the year 1813; but which have not been charged to the particular appropriation of the 30th of March, 1812, though applied to the same purposes as timber chargeable to that appropriation would have been, viz: in building the three 74's, at Portsmouth, Charlestown, and Philadelphia, the 44 guns ships at the latter place, and the 44 and sloop of war at the navy yard in this city; also, in the repairs of the ships of the navy, and in preparing several sets of spare masts, spars, tops, &c., ready for the ships which may return damaged; and the residue is applicable to similar purposes.

These have been charged, either under the head of repairs, or to the appropriation for building 74's and frigates; which appropriations, it is conceived, are properly chargeable with timber purchased for these purposes. Six cargoes, amounting to twenty-six hundred tons, of Georgia yellow pine timber, which had been cut for the use of the British navy, but entered the Eastern ports of the United States, on account of the war, have been purchased on favorable terms; also, a prize cargo of northern timber. These are properly chargeable to the annual appropriation for the purchase of timber. A contract was made in August last for the delivery at Norfolk, and this place, of a quantity of yellow pine plank, thick stuff, beams, and mast pieces, sufficient for two ships of 74 guns each, and two 44 gun frigates. The timber under this contract is now delivering. Contracts for timber, yet to be delivered, have been made at the Eastern stations, the particulars of which are not yet in the Department. A recent contract has been made at Philadelphia for the white oak plank, thick stuff, beams, and knees; and for yellow pine plank, and beams, sufficient for a 74 and a 44 gun ship; and for fifty sticks, of yellow pine for masts and spars. These are chargeable upon the appropriation of the 30th of March, 1812.

No contracts for live oak timber have yet been made, as the transportation is impracticable under existing circumstances; and if collected in considerable quantities at landings accessible to vessels fit for transportation, they would be equally so to the enemy, and the timber, when collected, would be liable to destruction. As live oak is exclusively applied to the frame of timbers, which constitute the form and mould of the ship, it is necessary that the timber should be cut and shaped, not only to the particular curve for which each piece is designated, but to its true oblique dimensions; otherwise great waste in the conversion, and expense in transportation will ensue; for this purpose it is necessary that draughts or designs of the contemplated ships should be determined, proper moulds made by which to cut and shape the timber, and mechanics employed to superintend the execution of the contracts. Hence, contracts for timber of this description cannot be made and executed with the same facility and certainty as for straight rectangular timber.

It is, therefore, considered that a state of peace will be much more favorable to the collection of a stock of timber of this description than that of war, in which it can neither be transported to the dock-yards nor deposited in safety at the seacoast landings. Nevertheless, it is contemplated to make the necessary arrangements for such supplies of suitable live oak timber as may be had in places of safety.

On this subject it is very satisfactory to learn, that our resources in timber of this kind are greatly extended, in the abundance which may be procured from the shores of the bays and waters near the mouth of the Mississippi. This species of timber requires very little seasoning; six months' docking will render it perfectly fit for use.

No further steps have been taken in relation to the dock-yards, than a general inquiry and proper deliberation, in order to determine upon the best site in a central situation.

The result has decided in favor of the right bank of the Hudson, above the Highlands. The motives to this decision were, from considering the contemplated dock yard as the nucleus around which a great naval establishment may be formed, comprising wet and dry docks, forges, foundries, boring, rolling, saw and block mills, blast and smelting furnaces, an armory, hydraulic engines, rope works, manufactories of sail-duck, and workshops of all kinds, which will require a copious head of water, readily commanded in this vicinity. Here, also, will be the main arsenal and depot of timber, and materials of all kinds, and the principal dock yard for constructing and repairing ships of war. Such an establishment in any of our seaports, accessible to ships-of-the-line, would form so great a temptation to a powerful enemy as to render destruction certain, unless protected by forts and garrisons of the most formidable and expensive nature.

The natural defences at the pass of the Highlands, are such as to remove all doubt on this subject, and supersede the necessity of a large protecting force.

The Hudson is a deep, bold, noble stream, of easy and safe navigation. The surrounding country produces abundance of iron, and large quantities of hemp; and the banks of the Hudson furnish a variety of timber fit for naval purposes. The communication with the northern and western lakes, is more direct and favorable to the distribution of naval and military stores than any other situation that can be selected. The only objection of importance that I have heard suggested is, that the Hudson at this point is closed by the ice a fortnight sooner, and opens a fortnight later, than at New York; but this objection is greatly overbalanced by the extraordinary advantages of the situation.

In order to select the most suitable situation, a careful examination and survey, under the direction of some of our most experienced officers, aided by a skilful engineer, appears to be indispensable, an opportunity for which has been prevented by the active operations of the war, and consequent occupation of the officers best qualified for this service.

The number of seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, authorized by law, is indefinite and discretionary with the President, as will appear by the following reference:

The act of Congress of the 21st of April, 1806, vol. 8, page 109, limits the officers, seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, to 13 captains,

9 masters commandant,

72 lieutenants,

150 midshipmen, and

925 seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys.

The act of the same date, page 142, authorizes the President to man and equip the gunboats.

The act of the 3d of March, 1807, authorizes the employment of 500 additional seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys.

The act of the 31st of January, 1809, vol. 9, page 206, authorizes the employment of 300 additional midshipmen, and 3,600 additional seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys.

The act of the 30th of March, 1812, vol. 11, page 89, authorizes officers and seamen of the navy to be increased so far as may be necessary to officer, man, and equip the vessels to be put in service.

The act of the 2d of January, 1813, page 340, provides for the building, officering, and manning four 74's and six frigates.

The act of the 3d of March, 1813, page 429, authorizes the President to build six sloops of war, and to build, or procure, such a number of sloops of war, or other armed vessels on the lakes, as the public service may require; and to appoint such officers, and to employ the number of seamen, as may be necessary for such vessels as are authorized by law to be put in commission.

The act of the 5th of July, 1813, vol. 12, page 10, authorizes the President to cause to be built, equipped, and manned, such number of barges as he may deem necessary.

There is no correct data in the department, by which to ascertain the actual number of seamen, ordinary seamen, and boys, employed at any one period. The longest period of enlistment being for two years, and in many cases, for the flotilla service, for a shorter period, the number is constantly fluctuating, and consequently cannot be correctly ascertained; but it is believed, from a general view of the subject by the Accountant and myself, that the number employed during the year 1813, has considerably exceeded the estimate for that year.

There is not at this time, in the department, sufficient data upon which to estimate the number of gunboats actually fit for service; some have undergone partial repairs, while others have deteriorated.

The following will show the number on each station, and their presumed condition, viz:

| | Gunboats. |

| Newburyport do. | - - 2 |

When it is considered that six large sloops of war have been built, equipped and manned, in our seaports, and three sloops of war and one ship of 26 guns on the lakes, within the preceding eight months; that three 74's and three 44's will be added this year, but which are yet to be manned, and that provision still exists for building one 74 and three 44's as soon as suitable materials can be had; it appears to me that any further provision at present for the increase of our naval force would not add to its efficiency, and therefore is not necessary; except such as I have suggested in my letter to the Chairman of the Naval Committee of the House of Representatives, a copy of which I have the honor to enclose; and even of that description, the number ought to be very moderate, when the contemplated increase of our force on the lakes, and the demand for experienced officers and seamen, which the very rapid augmentation of our force has created, are taken into view. The flotilla service, moreover, is still very deficient in men. We may readily and rapidly add any reasonable number of vessels to our force, but their armament and many parts of their equipment of every description, will be to fabricate. The cannon foundries are few in number, and none of any note north of the waters of the Chesapeake. These have been, are now, and will be fully engaged during the present year, in fabricating the ordnance required for the force already authorized. The private armed vessels cannot at this time procure their armament of a proper kind on any terms.

With the rapid increase of our naval force, the promotion of young officers has been necessarily very rapid; and those whose experience and talents have exalted our flag are comparatively few in number. Therefore, however desirable it may be to give the senior lieutenants separate commands, in which they would be useful to their country and acquire honor to themselves, it will leave our 74's and frigates and squadrons on the lakes without officers of sufficient experience. This has been a subject of serious solicitude with some of our commanders; and the tenacious policy of our naval system precludes the admission of talent and experience from any other source than lineal promotion. It is true sailing masters have been promoted to lieutenants, under special circumstances; and I perceive no good reason why this experienced and valuable class of officers should not be as regularly entitled to promotion as midshipmen.

With these views the honorable committee will be enabled to appreciate the arguments which I have deemed it proper to offer for their consideration.

I also beg leave to suggest the propriety of augmenting the Marine Corps from the present establishment, 1,869, to 2,652, and to increase the number of commissioned officers in the same proportion as in the infantry of the army.

It is not necessary to recall the recollection of the honorable committee to the gallant part this distinguished corps has acted in all the noble victories which have been achieved; nor to its character for discipline, valor, and patient endurance of the most severe service on the lakes, in which it has suffered excessively; suffice it to say, that it is not surpassed by any body of men in the service of the United States, though seen only in the back ground of the picture, and without the ordinary inducements to noble actions—a reasonable prospect of promotion, with a sprig of the laurel which it may help to gather. The augmentation which I recommend, will be actually necessary for the force now authorized, as will be illustrated by the estimate which accompanies this. This corps is, moreover, exceedingly useful at our several naval stations, and from its amphibious character calculated to render important services in every situation.

We have a right, sir, to anticipate during the ensuing Summer the most urgent occasion for the vigorous employment of the flotilla for the defence of the waters of the United States; and it has become a very interesting question, how that force is to be commanded with the best effect. That service is, at best, unpopular with the regular officers of the navy; and the services of those officers who are qualified for separate command are required to meet the increased demand for the regular naval force, particularly on the lakes, which is very pressing. Those officers who are deficient in experience, are justly averse to the flotilla service; because they can acquire but very little useful professional knowledge; and, indeed, it is a service in which those who are to form the officers for the ships of war, ought not to be engaged.

There are other intrinsic difficulties in this service which are unknown on board our ships of war. The temptations to insubordination and vice are much greater in this scattered and amphibious kind of force; and the rigors of naval discipline, unless tempered with judgment and great moderation, discourage the recruiting for this service.

Bay and river craft men, seamen, ordinary seamen who have families, riggers and naval mechanics out of employ, will engage in the service under a local commander of capacity and influence, when they will not engage for the regular naval service.

As rank in our naval service can only be attained by regular gradation, commanders of talents, local knowledge, influence, and distinguished courage, cannot be commissioned for this service under the present regulations. The necessity of the case, from the reasons which I have assigned, has induced the employment of a few acting officers with command, but without rank, in two of the most important situations, viz: New York harbor and the Chesapeake bay. These appointments appear to have given great confidence in these districts, and the success in recruiting for the service on these stations, considering the unequal competition of the military and private service, has been favorable.

I would, therefore, take the liberty of suggesting the utility of providing by law for the appointment of four captains, with the same relative rank and authority in the flotilla service, and the same pay and emoluments, as captains in the navy; and twelve lieutenants with the same relative rank and authority in the flotilla service, and the same pay and emoluments, as lieutenants in the navy; but limited to the temporary employment of the flotilla without rank in the navy, other than in the flotilla in which they may serve, and subject only to the orders of the President of the United States; in all other respects to be governed by the rules and regulations provided for the government of the navy.

There is an object of great importance, to which I could have wished to draw your attention. I mean the re-organization of the Navy Department; of the necessity of which, no one can be more sensible than myself; but really my faculties have been so closely engaged with the multifarious objects, and the current and incessant labors of the department, during a period of the most active and important operations, that I have had no leisure to deliberate upon, and digest a system satisfactory to myself, or such as I can present to you at this time. And, as it is better to labor with known evils than to hazard a premature and inadequate system, I have thought it best to postpone the subject for the present, respectfully submitting, how-
